

Pennsylvania, colonial and federal

Pennsylvania

Colonial and Federal

Portrait of a young man, painted by Sir Isaac Newton, 1669.

Pennsylvania

Colonial and Federal

HISTORY : : : 1608-1907
BY HOWARD A. JENKINS

Volume One

Pennsylvania Historical Publishing Association
100 Second and forty North Fifteenth Street Philadelphia • Pennsylvania : : MCMII

Pennsylvania

Colonial and Federal

A HISTORY : : : 1608-1907
Editor HOWARD M. JENKINS

Volume One

Pennsylvania Historical Publishing Association
One hundred and forty North Fifteenth Street Philadelphia • Pennsylvania : : MCMVII

F 149
.J52
1907 261579
v. 1

Copyright, 1907
By the Pennsylvania Historical Publishing Association

VTDGVBU
AIBDRIV 70

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL AND FEDERAL · A HISTORY

Editor in Chief

HOWARD M. JENKINS

Authors

HOWARD M. JENKINS, CHARLES P. KEITH, LEWIS
R. HARLEY, PH. D., WILLIAM J. HOLLAND, LL. D., JOHN D. SHAFER, NATHAN C. SCHAEFFER, PH. D., LL. D., CHARLES W. DULLES, M. D., ALEXANDER
K. McCLURE, LL. D., LEWIS CASS ALDRICH, JAMES M. SWANK, DOLPH B. ATHERTON H. PERRY
SMITH, J. T. ROTHROCK, M. D., B. S. : : : : :

Associate Editors

GEORGE WHARTON PEPPER, STANLEY WOOD-WARD, B. A., LOUIS ARTHUR WATRES, GEORGE
EDWARD REED, S. T. D., LL. D., HENRY GRAHAM
ASHMEAD, JOHN P. VINCENT. : : : : :

Preface

THE HISTORY OF PENNSYLVANIA, it will be conceded by all familiar with the subject, has not heretofore been presented in any work with the fullness or the breadth of treatment to which it has been entitled. There have been numerous essays toward it, from the time of Robert Proud down to a more recent day, some of them worthy of much appreciation and deserving of high praise, yet it still remained true that at the end of three centuries our Commonwealth and its people were without an adequate and a completely satisfactory history. It was to supply such a history that Howard M. Jenkins, several years since, undertook the preparation and supervision of the volumes which are now submitted to the public. The subject is itself one of unusual complexity. To the making of Pennsylvania, in the early time, many streams of life contributed, and the mingling and fusion of these, not without friction and even conflict, is a theme which called for an open mind and a just discrimination. So, too, since the Colony became the State, its career has been directed and illustrated by men of varying characters, qualities and opinions. To the development of its vast material interests and the upbuilding of its industries, energy and capital have been applied in a degree practically unequalled in the world's experience. To attain the high standard of excellence necessary to properly cover this varied subject, well known authorities on special periods and topics have made contributions to the narrative that have materially enhanced its scope and value. Other most valuable material has been contributed or assistance rendered by public spirited citizens in various parts of the Commonwealth, among whom are Stanley Woodward, Lewis Arthur Watres, James T. Mitchell, Hampton L. Carson, Samuel W. Pennypacker, George Wharton Pepper, Lewis R. Harley, C. LaRue Munson John P. Vincent, John W. Simonton, Robert Snodgrass, Martin Bell, Joshua Douglass, John Dalzell, William M. Brown, Benjamin Whitman, George Morris Philips, Albert S. Bolles, George Edward Reed, Horace E. Hayden, William A. Kelker, Samuel B. Shearer, Mrs. William M. Darlington, Mrs. Louise Welles Murray, Henry Graham Ashmead, Julius F. Sachse, Albert Rosenthal, Robert W. Leslie, Frank Reeder, E. W. Spangler, C. D. Clark, Lewis Cass Aldrich, and H. Perry Smith. Valuable help extended by the officers and assistants in the public libraries throughout the State, The Historical Society of Pennsylvania, The American Philosophical Society, The Historical Society of Dauphin County, The Wyoming Historical and Geological Society, The Tioga Point Historical Society and other similar organizations, deserves particular mention and gratitude.

PREFACE

THE PUBLISHERS

Contents

CHAPTER I

THE INDIANS OF PENNSYLVANIA.....	1
----------------------------------	---

CHAPTER II

PIONEER WHITE MEN IN PENNSYLVANIA—1608-1638....	30
---	----

CHAPTER III

THE SWEDES: THE FIRST SETTLEMENT IN PENNSYLVANIA —1638-1655	67
--	----

CHAPTER IV

THE DUTCH SETTLEMENT—1655-1664.....	111
-------------------------------------	-----

CHAPTER V

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK—1664-1681.....	135
---------------------------------------	-----

CHAPTER VI

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA.....	188
----------------------------------	-----

CHAPTER VII

THE BEGINNING OF PENN'S COLONY—1681-1700.....	236
---	-----

CHAPTER VIII

THE ENGLISH SETTLEMENT.....	307
-----------------------------	-----

CONTENTS

CHAPTER IX

THE SUSPENSION AND RESTORATION OF PENN'S GOVERN- MENT AND HIS SECOND VISIT.....	325
--	------------

CHAPTER X

PENN'S LIEUTENANT-GOVERNORS.....	346
---	------------

CHAPTER XI

THE CLAIM OF THE HEIR-AT-LAW.....	363
--	------------

CHAPTER XII

THE TIME OF JOHN PENN "THE AMERICAN".....	374
--	------------

CHAPTER XIII

THOMAS PENN AND RICHARD PENN	402
---	------------

CHAPTER XIV

THE FRENCH INVASION	415
----------------------------------	------------

Etchings

WILLIAM PENN.....	Frontispiece
HENRY MELCHIOR MUHLENBERG.....	Opposite page 80
BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.....	Opposite page 192
DAVID RITTENHOUSE.....	Opposite page 320
ROBERT MORRIS.....	Opposite page 400

Illustrations

INDIAN ROCK CARVING.....	4, 8, 13, 20
SPANISH HILL.....	25
SPANISH HILL.....	29
AXEL OXENSTIERN—Portrait.....	37
GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS—Portrait.....	41
JAMES I—Portrait.....	45
HENRY HUDSON—Portrait.....	51
DAVID PIETERSEN DE VRIES—Portrait.....	57
CHARLES II—Portrait.....	60
PENN'S AUTOGRAPH AND SEAL ON THE CHARTER OF 1683.....	61
ARMS OF PENN.....	64
LORD BALTIMORE—Portrait.....	68
CALVERT ARMS.....	73
PETER STUYVESANT—Portrait.....	77
AUGUSTINE HERMAN—Portrait.....	84
SIGNATURE OF DAVID LLOYD.....	85

ILLUSTRATIONS

TITLE PAGE OF ENGLISH BOOK USED TO INFLUENCE IMMIGRATION TO PENNSYLVANIA	89
ORIGINAL SEAL OF CHESTER COUNTY.....	92
REPRODUCTION OF WEST'S "PENN'S TREATY WITH THE INDIANS".....	95
BELT OF WAMPUM.....	101
THE TREATY ELM.....	107
SIGNATURE OF WILLIAM PENN.....	116
PROCLAMATION OF THE CHARTER TO WILLIAM PENN.....	125
SIGNATURE OF THOMAS LLOYD.....	128
SIGNATURE OF EDWARD SHIPPEN.....	129
SEAL OF DAVID LLOYD.....	132
OLD PENN MANSION, LETITIA COURT.....	137
SIGNATURE OF THOMAS WYNNE.....	140
CALEB PUSEY HOUSE.....	141
SIGNATURE OF TAMANEN.....	144
SIGNATURE OF NICHOLAS MORE.....	145
TITLE PAGE OF DUTCH BOOK TO INFLUENCE IMMIGRATION TO PENNSYLVANIA.....	149
JAMES II—Portrait.....	153
SIGNATURE OF WILLIAM MARKHAM.....	156
GEORGE FOX—Portrait.....	157
SIGNATURE OF ARTHUR COOKE.....	160
WILLIAM PENN'S CHAIR.....	164
SIGNATURE OF JOHN BLACKWELL.....	165
SIGNATURE OF JOSEPH GROWDON.....	168
TITLE PAGE OF ENGLISH BOOK TO INDUCE IMMIGRATION TO PENNSYLVANIA.....	169
SIGNATURE OF WILLIAM CLARKE.....	172
SIGNATURE OF BENJAMIN FLETCHER.....	173
GREAT MEETING HOUSE.....	176
SIGNATURE OF SAMUEL CARPENTER.....	177
SIGNATURE OF JOHN GOODSONN.....	182
SEAL OF BUCKS COUNTY INROLMENT OFFICE.....	184
SIGNATURE OF JOHN SIMCOCKS.....	185
SIGNATURE OF JOHN BLUNSTON.....	186
OLD SWEDES' CHURCH.....	190
TITLE PAGE OF GERMAN BOOK TO INDUCE IMMIGRATION TO PENNSYLVANIA.....	197
GREAT SEAL OF THE PROVINCE OF PENNSYLVANIA—1712:
OBSERVE	200
REVERSE	201
QUEEN ANNE—Portrait.....	205
SEAL OF REGISTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE.....	209

ILLUSTRATIONS

HOME OF JOHN HARRIS.....	212
GEORGE I—PORTRAIT	213
GRAEME PARK	219
HEADING OF FIRST PAPER PUBLISHED IN PENNSYLVANIA.....	221
WILLIAM KEITH—PORTRAIT	229
COURT HOUSE OR CITY HALL, CHESTER.....	232
ANCESTRAL HOME OF THE LINCOLNS.....	237
ISAAC NORRIS—PORTRAIT AND SIGNATURE.....	240
LOGAN ARMS	244
STENTON	245
LESSER SEAL OF PROVINCE.....	248
ORIGINAL LOG COLLEGE BUILDING.....	252
THE BARTRAM HOUSE	253
KELSO FERRY HOUSE	260
BIRTHPLACE OF BENJAMIN WEST.....	264
SEAL OF BUCKS COUNTY IN 1738.....	268
OLD HAMMER AND TROWEL INN.....	272
BOEHM'S REFORMED CHURCH.....	276
PAXTON CHURCH	280
SISTERS' HOUSE AND SAAL EPHRATA.....	284
INTERIOR OF SAAL, EPHRATA CLOISTER.....	288
OLD TRAPPE CHURCH	292
THOMAS PENN—PORTRAIT	297
NICHOLAS LOUIS ZINZENDORF—PORTRAIT.....	303
GEORGE WHITEFIELD—PORTRAIT AND SIGNATURE.....	309
WHITEFIELD HOUSE OR NAZARETH STOCKADE.....	312
TITLE PAGE OF SAUR BIBLE.....	317
OLD FRANKLIN PRESS.....	321
SPECIMEN OF EPHRATA CLOISTER PEN WORK.....	329
SPECIMEN OF EPHRATA COMMUNITY WOOD CUTS.....	333
THOMAS CADWALADER—PORTRAIT	336
COPY OF CELERON'S LEADEN PLATES.....	341
WASHINGTON'S HILL	344
SPECIMEN OF EPHRATA CLOISTER MUSIC.....	349
FRANKLIN'S DEVICE	353
JAMES HAMILTON—PORTRAIT.....	356
OLD SHAWANEE CHURCH	360
RICHARD PENN—PORTRAIT	365
RELICS FROM DUNBAR'S CAMP.....	369
RALSTON, OR BROWN FORT.....	377
GEORGE CROGHAN—PORTRAIT.....	380
MAP SHOWING LOCATION OF FORT SHIRLEY.....	384

ILLUSTRATIONS

BRIETENBACK BLOCK HOUSE.....	389
E. BRADDOCK—PORTRAIT AND SIGNATURE.....	393
BRADDOCK'S FIELD	397
ROCKING FAMILY MEAT-CUTTER.....	403
MAP OF PENNSYLVANIA ISSUED IN 1756.....	409
TIMOTHY HORSFIELD—PORTRAIT	417
PLAN OF FORT AUGUSTA.....	421
REMAINS OF OLD MAGAZINE AT FORT AUGUSTA.....	429
HOUSE OF CONRAD WEISER, READING.....	433
GEORGE II—PORTRAIT	437
CHIMNEY ROCKS	441

Pennsylvania

Colonial and Federal

CHAPTER I

THE INDIANS OF PENNSYLVANIA

THE stream of American history flows from a source comparatively near—the arrival here of white men from Europe. In the year when Elizabeth of England died, 1603, no white man, it is safe to say, had ever seen the region which we call PENNSYLVANIA. Its vast woods, its great rivers, its unique mineral treasures, were then as unknown to the wisest geographer of the Old World as were the deepest jungles of Africa, or the farthest ice-floes of the polar seas.

The opening years of the Seventeenth Century become thus the initial period for our narrative. The arrival of the white men, and the human experiences growing out of that epochal event, form the story which we have to tell.

Yet Pennsylvania had its own inhabitants, a people who possessed no doubt a long and romantic history, when the ships of the white men came. They were tribes of that red race whom, since the voyages of Columbus, and because of his geographical error, we have called Indians. Their presence and influence form the background to all American history, and we must pause to consider them before we can intelligently proceed. We have some sources of knowledge concerning them as they appeared when the white men came: their own traditions, legends, and folk-lore; evidence afforded by their arms, implements, and utensils; descriptions of them by the white people who saw them early; and finally study of them under the light which we have gained concerning the life of similar primitive peoples throughout the world. Yet with the best efforts to utilize all these sources our knowledge of the Indians remains meagre and unsatisfying.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

It may be said, in brief, that the whole of Pennsylvania, in the year 1600, was the Indians' land. While they did not occupy it, in a strict sense of the word, they enjoyed its complete possession in the manner suited to their way of life; they hunted in the forests, fished in the streams, planted their little crops in the open spaces, and appropriated to their use whatever it might yield them of air to breathe, water to drink, food and shelter, enjoyment and pleasure, warfare and spoil. How many there were of them is wholly left to conjecture. It is agreed that they were few. A century later, an estimate attributed to William Penn supposed there were "ten Indian Nations" in the province, with "about six thousand" souls belonging to them. But this estimate seems too low for the end of the Seventeenth Century, and much too low for its beginning. The original printing of the estimate is in Oldmixon's "British Empire in America," published in 1701.

Who then were these Indians of Pennsylvania? What was their origin? Whence did they come? These are questions most suitable for the archæologist and philologist. If we judge by the evidence of language, the Indians of Eastern Pennsylvania would seem to have come from a parent stock in the far northeast, beyond the St. Lawrence river. Yet they themselves preserved a tradition, which Heckewelder, the pious Moravian missionary, who labored amongst them in the Eighteenth Century, has handed down to us, that they came from the distant west, a region far beyond the Mississippi, and had reached the Delaware after a migration occupying many years, or even centuries, in the course of which, as they passed through what are now the States of the Ohio Valley, they fought with and overcame tribes of that region, though these had desperately defended themselves in fortified places. This tradition is worthy of attention, but it is not a chapter of history.

THE INDIANS

In the concise review that must be here given we shall consider first the Indians of Eastern Pennsylvania, describing them as they probably were when the white men settled on the Delaware, in the first half of the Seventeenth Century. These Indians were a simple and primitive people, not "savage" as to disposition, nor in the stage of development properly designated by that word. They had long possessed and used fire. They subsisted only in part by the chase and the fishery; they depended in part for their food on a systematic tillage of the soil. They had developed some arts of manufacture. Their arms and implements were mostly of the Stone Age, but they had begun to emerge from it. They had a political system well settled and effective. Their social usages were in many particulars well developed and strictly observed. They comprehended and in a degree regarded moral obligations, and their ideas of religion exhibited a glimmering of the highest truth.

Along the Delaware river, on both sides, from the New York line—and beyond—down to the sea, these Indians, afterwards called Delawares, called themselves Len-â-pé or Lenni Len-â-pé. By language, and presumably by blood, they were members of a great Indian family, the Algonkian, the most extensive in North America. Tribes of this widespread family "stretched from Labrador to the Rocky Mountains, and from the Churchill river of Hudson Bay to Pamlico Sound in North Carolina." Though thus widely scattered, resemblances of language survived, and traditions of relationship were cherished among them all. Many of the Indian tribes with whom the history of the American people is most associated, many whose vigor and persistency of life have made them most familiar in our annals, are or were of this extensive group—Pequots and Narragansetts of New England, Mohegans of New York, Powhatans of Virginia, Shawnees, Miamis, Chippewas, Ottawas of the interior, and Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Blackfeet, and others of the Mississippi Valley and Far West. It was the Algonkian Indians whom the

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

English-speaking explorers, landing on the Atlantic Coast in Carolina and northward, first encountered, and who received them almost uniformly in peace. Massasoit, the lifelong friend of the Plymouth Pilgrims; his son Philip, famous for his brave but

Rock Carving of the Turtle Clan

The rock is in the bed of the Ohio river at Smith's Ferry. Photographed especially for this work from a cast in Carnegie Museum, Pittsburgh ineffectual resistance to white encroachment; Powhatan, forever conspicuous in the Virginia chronicle; and Pontiac and Tecumseh, who in the western country later struggled and failed like Philip to stem the white tide, were all Algonkian chiefs.

It is conceded that in this Algonkian family the Lenâpé of the Delaware region were representatives of a parent stock. In the traditions common to all the tribes special dignity and authority were assigned them. Forty tribes, it is said, looked up to them with respect, and in the Algonkian great councils—if such were ever held—they took first place as the “Grandfathers” of the race, while the others were called by them “children,” “nephews,” “grandchildren.” That this precedence of the Lenâpé had any importance within the period of the white settlement can hardly be said. It seems true that the Algonkian tribes refrained from war with one another, and some writers speak of a “Lenâpé Confederacy.”

THE INDIANS

The Lenâpé of the Delaware region formed three sub-tribes. These were the Min-si, people of the stony lands, who lived in the mountain country, from about the Lehigh river northward into New York and New Jersey; the U-na-mi, down-river people, whose habitat may be regarded as extending from the Lehigh to about the Delaware State line; and lastly the U-na-lach-tigo, tide-water people, or people living near the sea, who occupied the land on the lower reach of the river, and on the bay. How far each of these roamed and claimed it is hard to say; the Minsi spread into New Jersey; the Unami had an uncertain hold beyond the Schuylkill, toward the watershed of streams flowing to the Susquehanna; and the Unalachtigo probably occupied most of the east shore of the Delaware river, within the present State of Delaware.

After the manner general if not uniform among the North American Indians, each of these sub-tribes of the Lenâpé had its animal type, its totem. That of the mountaineers was appropriately the Wolf, the central sub-tribe had the Turtle, and the Bay dwellers the Turkey. With the creatures which they thus adopted as their symbols they imagined themselves in some way connected by a mystic but powerful tie, and each member of the totemic fraternity was closely bound to every other one. But to the Turtle, and consequently his sub-tribe, they ascribed the greatest dignity, for they shared with peoples of the Old World the myth that a great tortoise, first of all created beings, bore the earth upon its back. Thus, by their totem, the Unami had precedence, and in time of peace their sachem, or chief, wearing a diamond-marked wampum belt, was chief of the whole tribe. That the Minsi were the most vigorous and warlike of the Lenâpé is indicated by many evidences, and they were probably the strongest in numbers. From their holds in the mountains they reached northeastward to the banks of the Hudson and on that river joined hands with the Mohegans, another tribe of the Algonkian family; while they guarded, also, against the hostile approach of the tribes of Central New York, called by the English the Five Nations, and by the French the Iroquois. These tribes, five in number until 1712, we shall have to refer to many times and we pause here to speak more particularly of them. They were, at the time the white men came, the Caniengas, usually called Mohawks (or Maquas), Oneidas, Onondagas, Cayugas and Senecas. They belonged to a family distinct in language from the Algonkian tribes. By the genius of one of their own chiefs, an Onondaga, known in half-certain, half-dubious, traditions as Hiawatha, they had been united as a confederacy, at some time anterior to the period we now describe. They were a vigorous, energetic and aggressive people, but not more so than many of the Algonkian tribes. The accident of contact with the earliest white comers, the French and the Dutch, and consequently the earliest possession of firearms, started them on a career which influenced for two hundred years the course of history, not only as to Pennsylvania and New York, but as to the American Union itself. About 1712 they received from North Carolina the remnant of the Tuscarora tribe, which was of their lingual family, and became thereafter the Six Nations. In these pages we shall speak of them for the present as the Iroquois.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The political system of the Lenâpé, while it implied an obedience of the members of the tribe to its chief, was not far removed from a democracy. Chief and tribe were alike subject to long established custom, and while the chieftainship was considered hereditary in certain families, the individual assigned to it was subject to election by the tribe. That such a system should have been so well established, and should have served so fully to secure peace and order within a large tribe, is one of the marvels of the Indian. Throughout the country the wars of tribes with one another were common, perhaps almost incessant, but internal feuds and bloodshed were rare. The Indian's attachment to his own tribe was unqualified; such enemies as he had must be of some other tribe. "There were times," says Parkman, describing Indians of Canada, "when savages lived together in thousands with a harmony which civilization might envy." Penn, writing in 1683, his letter to the Free Society of Traders, said: "Every king hath his council; and that consists of all the old and wise men. . . Nothing of moment is undertaken, be it war, peace, selling of land, or traffic, without advising with them, and which is more with the young men, too. It is admirable to consider how powerful the kings are, and yet how they move by the breath of their people."

THE INDIANS

The Lenâpé could not have been a large tribe. Within the limits of Pennsylvania they numbered perhaps two thousand people. It cannot now be said with confidence that they had any central and fixed "town." They had places to which they resorted, such as rivers or creeks in which they fished; mountains where they hunted; or cleared spaces where they planted; but they had no buildings more substantial than the simple hut, or lodge, commonly known to the whites as the wigwam, in which they sheltered themselves. Its frame was formed of sapling trees, and was covered by the bark of larger ones. Each hut was for a single family, differing in this respect from the houses of the Iroquois, which were communal, each one accommodating several families. Sometimes the Lenâpé huts might be placed in groups, forming a village, and surrounded by a palisade of driven stakes, for defense against enemies, but all such frail structures decayed and disappeared almost as soon as their occupants quitted them.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The men were hunters and fishermen in times of peace, warriors when peace failed. Wild animals abounded in the far-stretching woods, and in the streams there were swarms of fish. The reports of the white explorers, as they sailed up the Delaware, through the country of the Lenâpé, glow with descriptions of the

Algonkian Rock Pictures, Safe Harbor

Reproduced especially for this work from United States government reports abundant wild life to be seen on every hand. When the white men came the "fur trade" was their first object, and the Indians brought them skins of many sorts—bear, deer, sable, beaver, otter, fox, wild-cat, lynx, raccoon, mink, musk-rat, and others. These animals had been caught in traps, or shot with bow and arrow, or perhaps run down by dogs, or killed with a spear or a club. Fish were speared in shallow places, or driven into pounds formed of brush, or caught with a simple hook and line.

THE INDIANS

Under the Indian system there was, of course, no private ownership of land. Its use, like its possession, was in common. A family had a right of temporary occupancy, but nothing more. Near their villages, in the alluvial bottom lands, or in spaces in the woods cleared by fire, the women raised the family crops, planting the maize, our "Indian corn," when "the oak leaf was the size of a squirrel's ear," and raising also beans, pumpkins, and a few other vegetables, including probably the sweet potato. In 1679, Dankers and Sluyter, the "Labadists," traveling through New Jersey, and fed by the Indians (probably Lenâpé), were regaled upon boiled beans, served in a calabash, "cooked without salt or grease," and "pounded maize, kneaded into bread, and baked under the ashes." Zeisberger describes the women as going into the woods in February to boil the maple sap, and make sugar, and this process is declared by some writers to be an Indian discovery. The Indians quickly adopted the raising of fruit from the white settlers' example, and their "orchards" are often spoken of.

We are to remember, when we consider their limited agriculture and their habitual residence along the streams, that Pennsylvania, from the Delaware to Lake Erie, was then an unbroken forest. Less than one-tenth of its surface, it may be said, was treeless land. To the explorer who passed along its eastern side the trees stood often at the water's edge, and when he landed he found them rising everywhere before him. Then and for a century after, among the whites, to go inland was "going into the woods," and as late as the Revolution an emigrant moving westward, if only a hundred miles, was commonly spoken of as "gone to the backwoods."

The Indians had no cutting implements of metal. They were not workers of metal. A few copper articles they seem to have had, but these were mostly ornaments, and the material of which they were wrought may have been "native" or pure copper, procured from surface deposit or shallow mine, or possibly brought from the shores of Lake Superior. To reduce ores, to extract the metal, and work it by fire and hammer, were processes beyond their knowledge.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

That the women should be assigned the labors in the field, as well as those within the lodge, was not strange. It was the ordinary usage of Indian life, and common indeed among such peoples the world over. The exertions of the men were often far more arduous. For the chase, and still more for the war, they needed not only strength, but agility. Labor which would impair their swiftness of movement would be fatal. The boys were trained from their earliest years to run, to jump, to fish, and to shoot; to endure hardships, to suffer hunger and thirst in silence.

Living thus in closest contact with Nature, and drawing subsistence from her, sometimes with greatest ease, sometimes with infinite difficulty, the Indian's faculties of observation were developed to a wonderful keenness. Signs of life and movement in forest or field, which a "civilized" man would not note, appeared to him plain. The habits of all wild creatures, the phenomena of the weather, the birth, growth, and decay of vegetation, the aspects of nature in the atmosphere and the sky, were familiar to him in the minutest detail, and thus for the purposes of the life he led he had a real education. Observing that the seasons recurred regularly, that seed-time and harvest, the budding and the fall of the leaf, came with uniform intervals, he made his own year, and divided it by its thirteen moons. Thus he could count his own age, and assign to events of the past their due order.

But among the Lenâpé the chronicle of events was practically an engraving on the tablets of the mind, and that only. If we except the "notched sticks" of record, which some of the Algonkian tribes employed, and which may have been used by the Lenâpé, it may be sweepingly said that they made no records, erected no monuments, carved no stones. The traditions they cherished, the laws they enacted, the usages they set up, all were oral, and were handed down by word of mouth.

THE INDIANS

It has already been said that these Indians had practically no metal implements or arms. Stone was their main material. It provided the axe, the hammer, the pestle—sometimes also the mortar—for pounding their corn into meal; the knife, the “skinner” for stripping off the skins of a slain animal, a hoe and a spade for the field, and a score of other articles in common use. It furnished the pipe in which they smoked their tobacco, quoits for their games, and even ornaments for their persons. For their weapons it supplied arrow-heads and spear-heads, and the “tomahawk” or battle-axe. It is these stone objects, surviving the tooth of time, which have remained as the most notable evidences of the Indian period in Pennsylvania.

The Lenâpé had, however, some other arts of manufacture. They were skilled in dressing the skins of animals, especially the deer. They made earthenware articles, baking them hard and black. Soapstone they hollowed out for pots and pans, while other household vessels were made of wood. The large wild gourd, the calabash, one of the few contributions to the use of the white people, served them as bucket and dipper. The women wove mats from the soft and tough inner bark of trees, and made ornamental garments from the plumage of birds. Strings of beads, “wampum,” which were used to decorate “belts” of ceremony, and in a limited way served as money, were usually made of bits of shells, from the shore of the sea. For dye-stuffs they had the wild berries, the bark of trees, and plants like the sumac, while colored clays furnished them a coarse but effective paint.

One fact not yet considered influenced the life of the Indians of Pennsylvania to a degree which we can understand only with an effort. They had, with the sole exception of the dog, a half-wild creature, no domestic animal. The horse they had never seen—nor the cow. They had not the llama of South America, the camel, the elephant, or any other of the beasts of burden so useful in the Old World. They had therefore no means of movement or transportation but those which their own bodily vigor supplied. On land they walked or ran, on the water they paddled their canoes. By their marches on the chase or in war they had worn paths, or "trails," which may yet be traced, here and there, over hill and mountain; but it is most probable that, living near many streams of water, they made large use of these as highways of travel. Their canoes may sometimes have been made of bark, but this seems uncertain; as a rule, the Lenâpé's canoe must have been a hollow log. By diligent labor with fire and his stone axe he felled a tree, and by the same means cut off a proper length, hollowed it out and shaped it. This was the "dug-out," the "pirogue," in which the earliest white explorers of the Delaware found the Indians who lived on its banks coming to meet their ships.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The Lenâpé were straight, of middle height, their color a reddish brown. Penn speaks of them as "generally tall, straight, well built, and of singular proportion; they tread strong and clever, and mostly walk with a lofty chin." Their complexion he called "black," but said it was artificially produced by the free use of bear-grease, and exposure to sun and weather.¹ They married young, the men, he says, usually at seventeen, the women at thirteen or fourteen. But their families were seldom large, and the increase of the tribe must have been slow. Polygamy existed but was not common. Marriage might or might not be a permanent relation; it was terminable by the husband at will, and the wife, also, Heckewelder says, might leave the husband. It is probable, however, that such separations were the exception rather than the rule. In one respect marriages were strictly controlled by the tribal law: it was required that a man of one sub-tribe must marry a woman of one of the others. A man of the Turkey sub-tribe, for example, chose a wife from the Turtle or the Wolf. So, too, the descent of sub-tribal membership, of property, and of honors, was through the female line. The child's totem was that rubbed them with fat, and exposed them to the hot sun, to make them brown." (Pennypacker's "Germantown," 235.)

¹This is also the statement of Pastorius, the Germantown settler (1685): "The children were white enough, but their parents

THE INDIANS

of its mother. A chief could not be succeeded, therefore, by his son, though he might be by his brother, or by the son of a sister, or son of some other female of his own blood and sub-tribe.

It has been said, earlier in this review, that the Indians had a glimmering perception of religious truth. They believed in the existence of Manitou, a Great Spirit, "the creator and preserver of heaven and earth." They conceived of a future existence.

Figures on "Indian God" Rock

There was a general belief in a soul, a spiritual and unmaterial part of man. They did not worship idols, though they gave superstitious reverence to light, especially as manifested in fire and the sun, and to the four winds, as typical of the cardinal points, and as rain-bringers. They conceived that the supreme Manitou had many inferior manitous, to whom he had committed rule and control over special conditions and circumstances, and they therefore desired to conciliate these, by sacrifices, dances, fasts, etc. They did not fear a Devil, Heckewelder says, being confident of safety so long as they believed they had the approval of the Great Spirit, and he declares indeed, as do no other authorities, that the idea of an evil spirit, or devil, was unknown to them until they received it from the whites. Their dances, songs, and sacrifices were significant as prayer, as propitiation, and as thanksgiving. No great undertaking was begun without such ceremony, and it was equally obligatory if the enterprise had successfully ended. The song and dance were, in fact, characteristic Indian performances. Nor was the festival less so. "In the fall when the corn cometh in," Penn says, "they begin to feast one another. There have been two great festivals already"—his letter is dated August 16—"to which all come that will."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Of the moral qualities of the Indians it is difficult to form a fair judgment for want of an accepted standard. If we judge them by the highest white ideals of a later day, to which few white men—if any—ever attain, they would be found very deficient. If we compare them to other primitive peoples, in the stage of social development which they had reached, they bear the comparison well. But the whole question of their morals, and their merits, then and since, has been confused by vehement differences of opinion concerning them. To some they were not merely "savages," but worse—"heathen" and "vermin," whom it was not only no crime but rather a duty to exterminate. In such a view they could not justify their right of existence, and for the white men to end it, by whatever means, was a praiseworthy act. On the other hand, they have had warm defenders and even enthusiastic eulogists. William Penn saw them with a favorable eye. The pioneer settlers of Pennsylvania, practically without exception, were their friends. The missionaries who labored amongst them, the Moravians especially, became warmly attached to them. So much depends, in fact, upon the point of view concerning the Indians that in a relation of the story of Pennsylvania's life during the colonial period we must be on our guard at every point lest partisanship for or against them influence the account.

Some facts concerning the Lenâpé are not open to dispute. Like Indians generally, they had remarkable self-control and fortitude. They had great endurance; they spared themselves no physical effort when an object important to them was in view. They were not treacherous, in the proper sense of the word; on the contrary they were remarkably loyal in friendships, and faithful to their agreements.¹ They received the white men in Pennsylvania kindly and with little appearance of suspicion. In numerous cases they furnished food which saved the settlers from destitution. "In liberality they excel," wrote Penn, and this was a marked characteristic. It was accompanied by and indeed may be said to have partly caused extreme improvidence. Not enough store of food was laid up for winter; not enough effort was made to provide for to-morrow; in consequence the Indians were often at starvation's door.

THE INDIANS

In estimating their moral condition one fact stands out. Though they often ate gluttonously when food was plenty they had no intoxicating drink. It seems plain that they knew not how to make any. No process, not even the simplest, of either fermentation or distillation was employed by them. The narcotic tobacco, which they smoked in pipes of clay, or stone, possibly also of copper, was their nearest approach to stimulant or intoxicant. It was reserved for the white men to bring them the curse of drink. Heckewelder records the Indian tradition of the first appearance of the white men at the mouth of the Hudson, when almost at once they offered the Mohegans drams of rum, and the intoxication that followed gave its enduring name, Manhattan—the island where we all got drunk—to the place. The Dutch, from the first, on both the Delaware and the Hudson, supplied the Indians with drink, and the Swedes and English, who followed, ¹Francis Daniel Pastorius, of Germantown, already cited (foot-note, ante), says, writing in 1695, of the Indians whom he had seen: "They are entirely candid, keep to their promises, and deceive and mislead nobody." He tells, however, this story: "A very cunning savage came to me one day, and offered to bring me a turkey hen for a certain price. But he brought me instead an eagle, and insisted upon it that it was a turkey. But I showed him that I knew very well the difference between the two birds. Then he said to a Swede standing by that he had not supposed that a German so lately arrived would know these birds apart." (Pennypacker's Germantown," p. 238.)

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

did the same. Kalm, the Swedish writer, said of the Lenâpé of New Jersey that while the small-pox had destroyed many, "brandy had killed most" of them. Penn, in 1683, described graphically the injury already done. The Indians had become, he says, "great lovers of strong liquors, rum especially," and for it they gave the richest of their skins and furs. "One of the most wretched spectacles in the world" they were when drunk. This remained a sadly familiar description. To the end of their history in Pennsylvania it was the same; the tempting and terrible "fire-water" wrought upon them every misery which humankind can suffer, and stripping them of self-command, vigor, and judgment, lost them at last the land they had called their own.

We may now consider that these details have fairly described the Indians of the Delaware region, at the opening of the historic period. It may be at once added that much of the description would apply to other Indians of Pennsylvania. But while our knowledge of the Lenâpé, at the time the white men came, is limited, and must be pieced out by observations made in later times, as of William Penn seventy-five years after, and of the missionary Heckewelder in the following century, our knowledge of other Indian tribes within the limits of the present State, in the beginning of the Seventeenth Century, is still more meagre. We have little more than a few names, some of them spelled many ways and unpronounceable, a few traditions, and a variety of disputed conclusions. We must therefore content ourselves with a brief survey, qualified by many uncertainties.

One general statement may be safely made concerning the Indians of the interior, in the valley of the Susquehanna and its three great branches, from Chesapeake Bay to the river's remotest springs; it is that none of them was of Algonkian stock, and that all were sometimes at war with, and ultimately were conquered by, the Iroquois of New York. The heads of the Susquehanna river stretch far up into the Iroquois country, and securing firearms promptly from the whites, those fierce and energetic confederates descended upon the convenient water ways, and were more than a match for any antagonist they found on the lower reaches of the stream. The whole interior of Pennsylvania, therefore, became by the close of the Seventeenth Century an appanage of the Iroquois.

THE INDIANS

On the Susquehanna, south of the Juniata and north of the Chesapeake, at the time the white men came, were the tribe called by the English of Virginia and Maryland Susquehannocks, and by the French Andastes. Their palisaded town, often mentioned afterward in colonial history, was apparently within the present limits of Lancaster county. They became familiar to the Swedes and the Dutch as the Minquas, this designation implying not alone bands upon the Susquehanna river itself, but others of the same tribe who occupied streams that flow into that river, and head eastward toward the Delaware. The Minquas were almost habitual enemies of the "river Indians," the Lenâpé. Their parties coming down the Christiana gave it early the name of Minquas Kill. The Lenâpé dolefully related to the white settlers the miseries they had endured at the hands of these "black Indians" of the interior.

Finally, the Susquehannocks, or Andastes, fell as has been intimated before the arms of the fierce confederates of New York, the Iroquois. From about 1650, for some time, the Mohawks were at war with them; later the Senecas carried on this warfare, and about 1674 finally overcame and scattered them. The Susquehannocks from that time disappear, unless, as is probable, the small band of Conestogas, whose dismal fortunes a century later we shall have to relate, were a remnant of this important tribe. Other tribes or bands were identified then and later with the lower Susquehanna; Captain Smith heard of two, whose names he gives on his map, but which have now no significance for us; and in colonial times there were the Conoys, otherwise Ganawese, who have been identified with the Piscataways of southern Maryland, and apparently were recent immigrants from that region.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

In western Pennsylvania, the valley of the Ohio was undoubtedly a favorite Indian land. Abundant evidences of this existed within the historic period. That picturesque region, with its wooded mountains, its swift streams, and narrow but fertile valleys, has, or had, many Indian remains—not only the ordinary stone implements and weapons, and fragments of pottery, but pictured rocks, defensive works, and burial mounds. Who the Indians were that left these behind is wholly unknown. Those tribes whom the whites found in western Pennsylvania, when the settlements were made there, a full century after the white occupancy of the Delaware began, were themselves new-comers, fragments of tribes driven thither, as the Lenâpé remnants then had been, from their original homes in regions to the eastward. We shall see, for example, that our earliest precise knowledge of Indian activities on the Allegheny, and at the site of Pittsburg, goes back no further than about 1720-25, leaving more than a century for important changes of habitat after the white men came.

Within the historic period there was a tribe upon the shores of Lake Erie, their habitat extending, it is probable, within the north-western corner of Pennsylvania. These were the people commonly known as Eries, or Erigas, or as the French called them, the Cat tribe. It is said that they were of the Iroquois family; it is also said that they were not—that they were Algonkians. It has been suggested that they were identical with the Shawanoes, or Shawnees, whose appearance and disappearance in widely-separated places is one of the puzzles in the history of the American Indian. They are described as a large tribe; one authority assigns them twenty-eight villages, with "twelve large towns or forts," and no less than 12,000 members; but these figures certainly are exaggerated. They were, French accounts say, fierce warriors, who used poisoned arrows, and were long a terror to the neighboring Iroquois. The Jesuits, who generally endeavored to convert the tribes on the Lakes, had no mission among them, though they appear to have been visited by Etienne Brulé, Champlain's adventurous interpreter, in the summer of 1615. The Eries also were finally victims of the Iroquois. In the year 1654, earlier than the subjugation of the Susquehannocks, the Iroquois attacked them furiously, and defeated and scattered them, and the historic account concerning them thus ends.

THE INDIANS

One enduring impress left upon Pennsylvania by the Indians and perhaps the most conspicuous one, is the names of places, and especially of flowing waters. Very generally the names which were given and which remain upon the rivers and creeks are Indian. The Delaware and Schuylkill are conspicuous exceptions, but the Lehigh, the Susquehanna, the Juniata, the Ohio, the Allegheny, the Monongahela, the Youghiogeny, the Kiskeminetas, the Conemaugh, are examples sufficient to prove the rule. Throughout the State scores and probably hundreds of the streams have Indian names, some of them strikingly beautiful, some by corruption of the original changed to forms less pleasing and hardly to be identified as Indian.

Though we shall be anticipating somewhat the course of our narrative, and taking up events out of their order, it seems most convenient to consider here the relation borne for a time, after the white men came, by the Iroquois Indians of New York to the Lenâpé Indians on the Delaware. It is unquestionable that during a period more or less extended the former claimed, and the latter, or some of them, conceded, a certain supremacy of the Iroquois. But the exact nature of this supremacy, the time when it began, the manner in which it was established, and the extent of its exercise, have all been matters of dispute.

We shall be able to relieve the subject of part of its liability to confusion by considering first some facts which are not disputed. In the first place, there is no evidence that the purchases of the land on the Delaware made by the Dutch, or the Swedes, or by William Penn, had any reference to the Iroquois tribes of New York. These dealings were with local Indian chiefs, and with them only. The deeds make no allusion to any overlordship. From the Capes northward nearly to the Lehigh river, on the west side, and upward into New York on the east side, the lands were sold by the Lenâpé as an independent and sovereign people.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Indian Rock Pictures, Millsboro

Reproduced especially for this work from United States government reports

In the valley of the Susquehanna, as we have seen, the Lenâpé held no land. It was held by their enemies, the Susquehannocks on the lower reaches of the river, and the Iroquois on the upper, until the latter, by conquest, acquired entire control. The Lenâpé had possession, it would appear, of lands on the western affluents of the Schuylkill, but they had no hold upon the region beyond the watershed where they rise.

THE INDIANS

By eliminating thus a large part of the Delaware valley and the whole of the Susquehanna valley from consideration, we have narrowed the field in which the Iroquois could have exercised a supremacy of any great importance over the Lenâpé. We have left simply the mountain country of the Minsi, from the Lehigh river northward, on the west side of the Delaware. It may be said in a word that the Minsi, while they remained in this region, were probably subject, for some fifty years or more, to the Iroquois.

So early as 1609, when Champlain, in July of that year, made his famous attack upon them, on the site of Ticonderoga, the Mohawks of New York learned the deadly effectiveness of fire-arms. His match-locks with triggers—the “arquebuses” of the French armorers of that time—spread death and dismay in the ranks of the Indians. It was a lesson to them, terrible and effective, and needing no repetition. From that day they endeavored to procure for themselves the weapons whose destructive power they had witnessed, and in the Dutch records there is abundant evidence that the demand thus created was soon supplied.

The encounter at Ticonderoga coincided almost precisely with Hudson's discovery of the great river that bears his name. The two events were but a month apart. Trade on the Hudson river began quickly, and filled with desire for Indian furs, the Dutch traders lost no time in supplying the guns and powder which would secure them. By 1630, when traffic on the Delaware was hardly yet begun, there was centered at Albany, extending into the country of the Iroquois, a barter of furs and firearms, whose profits brought joy to the white trader, and which equipped the red man for a more effective warfare than he ever yet had waged. In November, 1643, the Dutch settlers at Manhattan, in their pitiful appeal for aid to the authorities in Holland, said the Indians were "well provided with guns, powder, and lead, which they purchased for beaver from the private traders who have had for a long time free range here." The "Brief Description of New Netherland," written 1641-1646, for use in Holland, says the settlers of Rensselaerwyck (on the Hudson below Albany), at an early time, "perceiving that the Mohawks were craving for guns, which some of them had already received from the English," made large profits by selling more of them, and also that the gain of the trade being noised about, traders coming over from Holland "brought over great quantities," and the Mohawks, "in a short time," were seen well provided "with firelocks, powder and lead."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

It was not only the whites who suffered, in conflicts with the Indians thus armed, it was as well the traditional enemies of the Iroquois, in all directions, including the Mohegans and the mountain bands of the Lenâpé. These latter demanded arms also, but the traders at Manhattan were more strictly controlled than those in the Mohawk country, and could not supply them. The Dutch law forbade the sale of arms to the Indians, "on pain of death," and with the scandals of the up-river trade discussed hotly at Manhattan, it was scarcely possible for the Mohegans and the Minsi to obtain there the new and more deadly weapons.

The outcome of the struggle between the Iroquois and Lenâpé was thus plainly to be foretold. The same fierce attacks which the Iroquois had made upon the Eries and the Susquehannocks they made, as occasion offered, upon the Algonkian tribes. Yet the subjugation of the Minsi must have proceeded slowly. It is evident that man for man they and the Mohegans were not inferior to the tribes of the Iroquois. As late as 1660, at Esopus, far up the Hudson toward the disputed valley through which the Rondout flows, and which separates the Iroquois and Mohegan strongholds, chiefs of the Algonkian tribes defied a Mohawk emissary, and claimed the land on which they were standing. "This is not your land!" they declared, "it is our land!" The Minsi and the Senecas were at war in that year, 1660, and the latter earnestly appealed to Governor Stuyvesant for a supply of powder and ball, as if they were hard pressed. Three years later, 1663, the two tribes were still fighting, the Minsi apparently with fair success.

THE INDIANS

These facts narrow the time in which Iroquois supremacy over the Minsi could have been exercised. We are brought down, seeking the period in which it might have begun, toward the date of William Penn's first arrival. It seems most probable that it was about 1680 when the Minsi began to feel themselves not a match for their assailants. In 1727, at an Indian treaty in Philadelphia, some of the Iroquois chiefs alleged that William Penn, "when he first arrived," (1682), sent to them "to desire them to sell land to him," and said also that later he spoke to them in terms acknowledging their control of the Lenâpé. These assertions, viewed in the light of what we know otherwise, may have a basis of truth. It is certain that Penn recognized promptly the control of the Susquehanna region by the New York tribes, and it may also be that he perceived besides that they had gained a hold upon the mountain region of the Minsi. In May, 1712, Governor Gookin met Sassoonan, and other Lenâpé chiefs, in council at White-marsh (near Philadelphia), and the latter explained that they had been "many years ago made tributaries to the Mingoes or Five Nations," and were now about to send them tribute belts and a calumet. That the Minsi, or some of them, would still have resisted, later than 1680, with white help, appears from the Pennsylvania records. In 1693, Colonel Fletcher, acting as "royal" governor of Pennsylvania during Penn's temporary eclipse, received in council at Philadelphia, "some Indians from the upper part of the river,"—Lenâpé certainly, and Minsi most likely. These urged upon him that he assist them in a war with the Seneca tribe. "Although we are a small number of Indians," they said, "yet we are men, and know fighting." They were, no doubt, the remnant of an "old guard" of their tribe, who recalled the time before the Iroquois triumph, and who would fain have renewed the struggle, with Fletcher's help—which of course he refused to give.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

If we conclude, then, that the Iroquois arms prevailed over those of the Minsi about 1680, or between that and 1700, we shall find, in reference to land treaties, indications of a deferential regard for the Iroquois manifested by the Pennsylvania colonial officials from about 1725; we shall see the arrogant claims of the Iroquois to an absolute overlordship of the Minsi country by 1742; and in 1756 we shall again find the Lenâpé—called then uniformly Delawares—claiming and compelling acknowledgment of their tribal independence. Thus it appears that the supremacy of the New York confederates may have lasted from 1680 to 1756, and that it was confined, as to lands, to the Minsi region. It is thus evident that it has been absurdly overestimated by many historical writers. In the face of abundant evidence that the Lenâpé were a vigorous people, capable of strong resentments and energetic action, it has been assumed that they were feeble and nerveless, a people unlike other Indians. "A long and intimate knowledge of the Delaware tribe," said William Henry Harrison, afterward President, "in peace and in war, as enemies and friends, has left upon my mind the most favorable impressions of their character for bravery, generosity, and fidelity to their engagements." This was testimony rendered them when, after many years of hard fortune, their tribe was shattered and disorganized; it compels us to believe that in an earlier time, armed with similar weapons and meeting upon an equal field, they must have been able to contend successfully with their Indian enemies.

We are to speak now of the explanation which the Lenâpé gave of the subjection to which they, or some of them, were reduced. They felt, no doubt, that it was degrading, and, as has been said, when the day of opportunity came they repudiated it. In the period, however, when it was not to be denied, they explained ingeniously, and perhaps with some grains of truth, how it had come about. By the persuasions of the Iroquois, they said, they had consented to serve as a tribe of peace, renouncing the practice of war. The Iroquois had come to them with honeyed persuasion, and had urged upon them that the dignity of ancestorship which they held among the tribes of the Algonkian family gave them great influence, and that it would be rendering a valuable and honorable service to the whole Indian race to allay the Spanish Hill, Bradford County

THE INDIANS

This hill is in the shape of a sugar loaf; the top level and eleven acres in extent. Undoubtedly it was one of the palisaded Indian towns of the Andastes; it is generally supposed to be Carantouan, mentioned by Etienne Brulé, Champlain's scout, who visited it in 1615, and this is confirmed by Champlain's map, as well as by many implements of Indian manufacture found on it. The first white settlers in the locality reported that the Indians called this hill "Hispan," but there is only faint tradition to justify the name. Rochefoucauld, a French traveler, in 1795, says the whites called the hill "Spanish Ramparts," from the remains of entrenchments; he adds, "one perpendicular breastwork yet remains, which plainly indicates that a parapet and ditch have been constructed here." Photograph by Irving K. Park animosities and terminate the wars which consumed their strength and actually threatened their destruction. To these persuasions, the Lenâpé said, they finally yielded, and consented to assume the position of a "woman nation," exercising an influence for peace in the midst of the others. At a great feast the Iroquois messengers appeared with belts of wampum to seal the engagement, and a solemn treaty to this effect was made, which subsequently the Iroquois perfidiously employed to subjugate and oppress the Lenâpé.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The kernel of truth which there may be in this story relates to the likelihood that diplomatic persuasion may have been used upon the Minsi, as well as the harsher argument of force—that the subjugation may have been accomplished by both means, employed at different times. Zeisberger, the Moravian, tells us that he himself saw the belts given by the Iroquois at the time the treaty was made. Heckewelder insists upon the verity of the account. Much learned dispute has been bestowed upon the subject. But, as we have seen, it is not of great importance as a feature of the case. The Iroquois supremacy over the Minsi, whether acquired by force, as is probable, from the earlier possession of firearms, or by craft, as is possible, or by both, as is equally possible, was a condition existing for a comparatively brief time, and in no way proving the physical or moral feebleness of the Lenâpé.

What has been said may serve to give a fair idea of those occupants of the soil of Pennsylvania whom the white men dispossessed. The history of their expulsion will throw further light upon them. We shall see them exhibit qualities commanding our respect and sympathy, coupled with other qualities which shock and repel us. In the struggle for life and home they displayed faults and virtues, weakness and strength, folly and sense. We may consider, then, that as the Seventeenth Century opened, in the years when the reign of Elizabeth was closing in England, and Shakespeare was building the structure of his fame, the red people of Pennsylvania were pursuing the simple round of their primitive life. No ships had reached their waters. No whisper had come to them of the enormous change that impended over them. Paddling their canoes upon the streams, spearing fish in the shallows, hunting bear and deer in the mountains, planting and gathering their crops in their little fields, dancing and singing at their festivals, or kindling their council-fires at the places long familiar to them, no thought had entered their child-like minds that the end of all this was at hand—that a great company of their fellow-men, living far away, had built prodigious canoes to cross the boundless waters, and were about to descend upon them, nominally in friendship, but really with plans and purposes which must ultimately mean to them destruction and death.

THE INDIANS

TRADITION OF THE LENAPE MIGRATION.

[From Rev. John Heckewelder's "History, Manners and Customs of the Indian Nations who once inhabited Pennsylvania and the Neighboring States." Originally published by him in 1818, under the auspices of the American Philosophical Society; republished, 1876, by the Pennsylvania Historical Society.]

The Lenni Lenâpé (according to the traditions handed down to them by their ancestors) resided many hundred years ago in a very distant country in the western part of the American continent. For some reason, which I do not find accounted for, they determined on migrating to the eastward, and accordingly set out together in a body. After a very long journey, and many nights' encampments¹ by the way, they at length arrived on the Namae si Sîpu,² where they fell in with the Mengwe, who had likewise emigrated from a distant country, and had struck upon this river somewhat higher up. Their object was the same with that of the Delawares; they were proceeding on to the eastward, until they should find a country that pleased them. The spies which the Lenâpé had sent forward for the purpose of reconnoitering, had long before their arrival discovered that the country east of the Mississippi was inhabited by a very powerful nation, who had many large towns built on the great rivers flowing through their land. These people (as I was told) called themselves Talligewi or Talligewi. Colonel John Gibson, however, a gentleman who has a thorough knowledge of the Indians and speaks several of their languages, is of the opinion that they were not called Talligewi, but Alligewi, and it would seem that he is right, from the traces of their name which still remain in the country, the Allegheny river and mountains having indubitably been named after them. The Delawares still call the former Alligewi Sîpu, the River of the Alligewi. . . .

Many wonderful things are told of this famous people. They are said to have been remarkably tall and stout, and there is a tradition that there were giants among them, people of a much larger size than the tallest of the Lenâpé. It is related that they had built to themselves regular fortifications or entrenchments, from whence they would sally out, but were generally repulsed. I have seen many of the fortifications said to have been built by them. . . .

When the Lenâpé arrived on the banks of the Mississippi, they sent a message to the Alligewi to request permission to settle themselves in their neighborhood. This was refused them, but they obtained leave to pass through the country and seek a settlement farther to the eastward. They ¹A night's encampment signifies a half of a year. ²The Mississippi—river of fish.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

accordingly began to cross the Namæsi Sipu, when the Alligewi, seeing that their numbers were so very great, and in fact they consisted of many thousands, made a furious attack on those who had crossed, threatening them all with destruction, if they dared to persist in coming over to their side of the river. Fired at the treachery of these people, and the great loss of men they had sustained, and besides, not being prepared for a conflict, the Lenâpé consulted on what was to be done; whether to retreat in the best manner they could, or try their strength, and let the enemy see that they were not cowards, but men, and too high-minded to suffer themselves to be driven off before they had made a trial of their strength, and were convinced that the enemy was too powerful for them. The Mengwe, who had hitherto been satisfied with being spectators from a distance, offered to join them, on condition that, after conquering the country, they should be entitled to share it with them; their proposal was accepted, and the resolution was taken by the two nations, to conquer or die.

Having thus united their forces, the Lenâpé and Mengwe declared war against the Alligewi, and great battles were fought, in which many warriors fell on both sides. The enemy fortified their large towns and erected fortifications, especially on large rivers, and near lakes, where they were successively attacked and sometimes stormed by the allies. An engagement took place in which hundreds fell, who were afterwards buried in holes or laid together in heaps and covered over with earth. No quarter was given, so that the Alligewi, at last, finding that their destruction was inevitable if they persisted in their obstinacy, abandoned the country to the conquerors, and fled down the Mississippi river, from whence they never returned. The war which was carried on with this nation lasted many years, during which the Lenâpé lost a great number of their warriors, while the Mengwe would always hang back in the rear, leaving them to face the enemy. In the end, the conquerors divided the country between themselves; the Mengwe made choice of the lands in the vicinity of the great lakes, and on their tributary streams, and the Lenâpé took possession of the country to the south. For a long period of time, some say many hundred years, the two nations resided peaceably in this country, and increased very fast; some of their most enterprising huntsmen and warriors crossed the great swamps,¹ and falling on streams running to the eastward, followed them down to the great Bay River, thence into the Bay itself, which we call Chesapeake. As they pursued their travels, partly by land and partly by water, sometimes near and at other times on the great Saltwater Lake, as they call the Sea, they discovered the great River, which we call the Delaware; and thence exploring still eastward, the Scheyichbi country, now named New Jersey, they arrived at another great stream, that which we call the Hudson or North River. Satisfied with what they had seen, they, (or some of them) after a long absence, returned to their nation and reported the discoveries they had made; they described the country they had discovered as abounding in game and various kinds of fruits; and the rivers and bays, with fish, tortoises, etc., together with abundance of water-fowl, and no enemy to be dreaded. They considered the event as a fortunate one for them, and concluding this to be the country destined for them by the Great Spirit, they began to emigrate thither, ¹This is taken to imply the glades of the Alleghany mountains.

THE INDIANS

as yet but in small bodies, so as not to be straitened for want of provisions by the way, some even laying by for a whole year; at last they settled on the four great rivers (which we call Delaware, Hudson, Susquehannah, and Potomack), making the Delaware, to which they gave the name of "Lenâpé-twihittuck" (the river or stream of the Lenâpé) the center of their possessions.

They say, however, that the whole of their nation did not reach this country; that many remained behind in order to aid and assist that great body

Axel Oxenstiern

Swedish statesman, 1583-1654. Assisted in founding the Swedish colony on the Delaware. Photographed especially for this work from a canvas in the Historical Society of Pennsylvania of their people, which had not crossed the Namæsi Sipu, but had retreated into the interior of the country on the other side, on being informed of the reception which those who had crossed had met with, and probably thinking that they had all been killed by the enemy.

Their nation finally became divided into three separate bodies; the larger body, which they suppose to have been one-half of the whole, was settled on the Atlantic, and the other half was again divided into two parts, one of which, the strongest as they suppose, remained beyond the Mississippi, and the remainder, where they left them, on this side of that river.

CHAPTER II

PIONEER WHITE MEN IN PENNSYLVANIA.—1608-1638

TWO great waterways south of Pennsylvania admit ships from Europe, and by them the white men came. Their first approach was up the Chesapeake.

At the height of summer, 1608, the Susquehannock Indians, at their "town" on the east bank of the Susquehanna river, within what we know as Lancaster county, received a message, hastily brought from below by two Indians, that strangers who had come up the great bay in a boat wished to see them. How the messengers described these strangers we can surmise; doubtless they gave them the character of superhuman beings—gods worthy of worship—for such the white men seemed to the Indians, when first seen.

The visitors were a boat-load, thirteen altogether, of those English colonists who had begun their troublous experiences at Jamestown, in Virginia, the year before. In command of the party was that famous figure in the history of American exploration and colonization, Captain John Smith, hero according to his own account of many adventures by sea and land, in the Old World and the New, occasion of interminable disputes to historians, author of the earliest tolerable map of the region we are now describing. Captain Smith and his party had left Jamestown on the 24th of July, and with sail and oar, encountering some dangers and no small privation, including fever that disabled several, had toiled up to the head of the bay. There they encountered sundry Indians, including a war party of "Massawomeks," whom the Jamestown captain met warily, for he had heard of them farther down the bay, from tribes on the eastern shore, the Nanticokes perhaps, as a "strenuous" people, greedy of spoil, delighted to shed blood.

THE INDIANS

"In crossing the bay," Smith says, "we encountered seven or eight canowes full of Massawomeks." After delay and parley, they "presented our Captaine with venison, beares flesh, fish, bowes, arrowes, clubs, targets, and beare skinnnes." They had just been at war with the Tockwoghs, near by, and in evidence showed "greene wounds," which they had received in the conflict. They parted from Smith at nightfall, promising as he understood to return in the morning, then paddled away up a river on the west side of the bay, which he called Willowby's, and which is supposed to be the Bush. In the morning they did not reappear; Smith saw them no more.

These "Massawomeks" are supposed to have been Iroquois of New York, from the descriptions which we shall have in a moment, derived from the Susquehannocks. The Tockwoghs who had given them the wounds, yet "greene," were a small tribe on a river on the east side of the Chesapeake, identified now as the Sassafras. To them Smith paid a visit, and they received him in friendship. His account says: "Many hatchets, knives, peeces of iron and brass we saw amongst them which they reported to have from the Susquehannocks, mightie people and mortall enemies with the Massawomeks. The Susquehannocks inhabit upon the chiefe spring of these four Branches of the bays head, two days higher than our barge could pass for rocks, yet we prevailed with the Interpreter to take with him another Interpreter to persuade the Susquehannocks to come visit us, for their language are different."

The head of Chesapeake bay Smith found "six or seven miles in breadth. It divides itself into four branches, the best cometh [from] northwest from among the mountains, but though canowes may goe a day's journey or two up it we could not get two miles up it with our boats for rocks." This, of course, was the Susquehanna. It is evident that he came near to, but probably not over, the line of Pennsylvania. "Having lost our grapnell among the rocks," he adds, "we were neare two hundred myles from home and our barge about two tuns." His crew were disabled; of the six sailors four were prostrated with sickness, leaving but two to help him navigate, for the other six, he says, were "gentlemen."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

On the Sassafra, enjoying the hospitality of the friendly Tockwoghs "three or four days," they waited for the return of the two messengers sent to the Susquehannocks. At the end of that time they were rewarded; the Pennsylvanians came. Smith's story proceeds:

"Sixty of these Susquehannocks came to us, with skins, bowes, arrowes, targets, beeds, swords, & tobacco pipes for presents. Such great and well proportioned men are seldom seen, for they seemed like giants to the English, yea, and to the neighbours, yet seemed of an honest and simple disposition. They were with much adoe restrained from adoring us as gods. These are the strangest people of all these countries, both in language and attire; for their language it may well become their proportions, sounding from them as a voyce in the vault. Their attire is the skinnnes of bears, and wolves, some have cossacks made of beares heads and skinnnes, that a man's head goes through the skinnnes neck, and the eares of the beare fastened to his shoulders, the nose and teeth hanging down his breast, another beares face split behind him, and at the end of the nose hung a paw, the half sleeves coming to the elbowes were the necks of beares, and the armes through the mouth with pawes hanging at their noses. One had the head of a wolfe hanging in a chaine for a jewell, his tobacco-pipe three quarters of a yard long, prettily carved with a bird, a deare, or some such devise at the great end, sufficient to beat out ones braines: with bowes, arrowes, and clubs, sutable to their greatnesse. Five of their chiefe Werowances came aboard us and crossed the bay in the barge. The picture of the greatest of them is signified in the mappe. The calfe of whose leg was three quarters of a yard about, and all the rest of his limbs so answerable to that proportion that he seemed the goodliest man we ever beheld. His hayre, the one side was long, the other shore close with a ridge over his crowne like a cocks combe. His arrowes were five quarters long, headed with the splinters of a white christall-like stone, in forme of a heart, an inch broad, an inch and a halfe or more long. These he wore in a woolves skinne at his backe for his quiver, his bow in the one hand and his clubbe in the other, as is described."

THE PIONEER WHITE MEN

These Susquehannocks, Smith goes on to say, "are scarce knowne to Powhatan. They can make neare six hundred able men,"—the usual exaggeration—"and are palisadoed in their towns to defend them from the Massawomeks." The adoration of Smith already alluded to they testified "most passionately," although he rebuked them. They sang first "a most fearful song," then "with a most strange, furious action and a hellish voice began an oration." When it was at last ended, "with a great painted beares-skin they covered him: then one ready with a great chayne of white beads, weighing at least six or seven pounds, hung it about his necke; the others had 18 mantels, made of divers sorts of skinnes sewed together; all these with many other toyes they layd at his feete, stroking their ceremonious hands about his necke for his creation to be their governor and protector, promising their aydes, victualls, or what they had to be his, if he would stay with them, to defend and revenge them of the Massawomeks."

This was impossible. "We left them at Tockwogh," says Smith, "sorrowing for our departure, yet we promised the next yeare againe to visit them. Many descriptions and discourses they made us, of Atquanachack, Massawomek, and other people, signifying they inhabit upon a great river beyond the mountaines, which we understood to be some great lake, or the river of Canada: and from the French to have their hatchets and commodities by trade."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Such were the Pennsylvanians of the lower Susquehanna, in the year 1608, according to Captain John Smith. His story must have the substance of truth, and though somewhat warily we are obliged to accept it as history. The heroic "werowance," the giant Indian with the enormous leg, stands indeed upon Smith's "mappe" to this day, towering over the rude delineation of bay and river, creek and mountain. That the bold captain exaggerated his proportions somewhat is most probable, yet human skeletons of extraordinary size have been dug up on the lower Susquehanna in our day, and may have been frames of such men as came to meet the white strangers in August, 1608.

At the least, we may say with confidence that here was the first contact of white men with the native people of Pennsylvania; if Smith did not actually come within the line of our present State, he saw its inhabitants earliest of all the European pioneers, and the red men, meeting him and his company, beheld for the first time the race that was coming to dispossess them.

Twelve months after Smith's visit to the head of the Chesapeake it was that by the voyage of Henry Hudson along the Atlantic coast the existence of Delaware Bay became definitely known to the white men, and a new way to Pennsylvania was ready for opening. On the 28th of August, 1609—a month later, as has been said in the preceding chapter, than Champlain's momentous encounter with the Mohawks at Ticonderoga—Hudson's Half Moon, coming slowly up from the Chesapeake Capes, past Chincoteague and the low sand-beaches of Rehoboth, entered the Capes of the Delaware. Hudson was an Englishman, but in the service now of the Dutch. The republic of the Netherlands, after a struggle never surpassed for heroism and constancy, had won a truce with Philip of Spain, and the Dutch merchants had sent the English captain out upon the old quest, a short way to China. He brought his little ship into the bay cautiously. It was about noon. The day was very warm. The place was wholly unknown to him, but the broad bay, bringing down its flood of waters, encouraged the hope that here at last might be a north-west passage to Cathay. The afternoon was spent in soundings, for shoal ground, now familiar to ship-captains and pilots, discouraged incautious movement, and once the Half-Moon touched bottom. Finally, at evening, Hudson cast anchor in eight fathoms of water, and next morning, deciding that "he who would thoroughly discover this great bay must have a small pinnacle to send before him," sailed northward up the New Jersey coast, and a few days later entered the great river that since has borne his name.

THE PIONEER WHITE MEN

Slight as this event seems in the narration, it has great importance in the history we are now presenting. Hudson made known thus to his employers, the Dutch East India Company, and to the sea-faring nations of western Europe, the existence of this wide bay, into which, as he perceived, a great river must discharge. His discovery laid the ground for the claim by the Dutch to the country on the Delaware. Exploration followed, then trade, then occupancy, so a new state. We shall find all this following in its time.

But neither John Smith nor Henry Hudson, as we have seen, entered Pennsylvania. They approached or reached the open doorway, but did not come inside. The actual visit of a white man was not made for six years after Hudson's call at the Capes. Apparently the first of white pioneers in Pennsylvania was a Frenchman, who came from Canada, Etienne Brulé, a follower of Champlain, the first Governor of New France. He was Champlain's interpreter and guide, "the dauntless woodsman, pioneer of pioneers," Parkman calls him—yet a man, it would appear, of qualities not all heroic.

We are not to forget that the French were in Canada long years before the English were in Virginia, or the Dutch at Manhattan. It was in 1534 that Jacques Cartier sailed up the St. Lawrence, and from that time there was French trade on that river; not until 1607 did the Jamestown colonists enter the Chesapeake, and settlement in that quarter begin. It would not be surprising, then, if one of Champlain's men, detached on some errand from one of the French excursions or forays into New York, should penetrate the unknown country to the south a little farther, and enter Pennsylvania. This, it seems, is what happened. In the summer of 1615, Champlain sent Brulé southward from Lake Ontario, through the country of the hostile Iroquois, to hasten the march of five hundred Indians of the Susquehanna region who had promised to join him in an attack on an Iroquois stronghold. Brulé went, accompanied by twelve Hurons. It was in the early autumn, the beginning of September. He and his companions made their way stealthily, and not without perilous adventure, southward to an Indian town which Champlain calls, in his narrative, Carantouan. It was palisaded; it could send out eight hundred warriors; its population, by such an estimate—very excessive it would seem—would be four thousand. It was situated "three days distant" from the Iroquois town (probably the place known to us as Nichol's Pond, in the town of Fenner, in Madison county, New York, near Lake Oneida), which Champlain and the Hurons meant to attack, and so must have been near, if not actually within, the limits of Pennsylvania.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Brulé and his five hundred allies arrived before the Iroquois fortress too late to aid Champlain, who had failed, had been wounded, and had retreated to Canada; he returned, therefore, with them, to Carantouan, and according to the account which he gave Champlain when next they met, three years later, he spent the winter, 1615-1616, in a tour of exploration into the regions southward from that place. His adventures are thus recorded in the "Voyages" of Champlain:

"Brulé was obliged to stay and spend the rest of the autumn and all the winter, for lack of company and escort home. While awaiting, he busied himself in exploring the country and visiting the tribes and territories adjacent to that place, and in making a tour along a river that debouches in the direction of Florida, where are many powerful and warlike nations, carrying on wars against each other. The climate there is very temperate, and there are great numbers of animals and abundance of small game. But to traverse and reach these regions requires practice, on account of the difficulties involved in passing the extensive wastes.

John Smith

Born 1580; died 1631

THE PIONEER WHITE MEN

"He continued his course along the river as far as the sea, and to islands, and lands near them, which are inhabited by various tribes and large numbers of savages, who are well disposed and love the French above all nations. But those who know the Dutch complain severely of them, since they treat them very roughly. Among other things he observed that the winter was very temperate, that it snowed very rarely, and that when it did the snow was not a foot deep and melted immediately.

"After traversing the country and observing what was noteworthy, he returned to the village of Carantouan, in order to find an escort for returning to our settlement."

And this is the story of Etienne Brulé's entrance upon and exploration of Central Pennsylvania, and the country farther southward. It seems meagre, it must be confessed; but we are to consider that it is the condensed account, given by Champlain (or the editor of his book), in the midst of matters which seemed to the Frenchman much more important. It exhibits Brulé as not merely coming across the line of Pennsylvania, or venturing a little way within, but traversing the State from the line of New York to the line of Maryland, exploring the valley of the Susquehanna through most of its length. Presumably he returned through the same region, if not precisely by the same route, to Carantouan, and he had thus gained by observation a knowledge of a large section of Pennsylvania—knowledge which hardly for a century to come any other white man would possess.

And now we return again to the Delaware, for there the venturing ships from Europe will presently come into Pennsylvania waters. After Hudson, almost precisely a twelvemonth, there came to the mouth of the bay, as he had done, one of the Virginia adventurers, Captain Samuel Argall, who had left Jamestown in June, 1610, on a voyage to seek provisions. He entered the bay on the 27th of August, and gave it the name Delaware, after Lord de la Warr, then Governor of Virginia. He "came to anchor," he says, "in a very great bay," where he "found great store of people, which were very kind." They promised him that the next day they would bring him "great store of corne," but in the evening, the wind suddenly changing, he judged it best to sail away.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The fame of Henry Hudson's voyage, and especially of his discovery of a great river flowing through a land rich with furs, roused the Dutch merchants and seamen, and ships from Holland soon after 1609 began to gather at the island called Manhattes, or Manhattan. Precisely what ships came, and when, in this early period, belongs to the history of New York, and in fact is but vaguely and incompletely known; but by 1614 there were or had lately been at Manhattan at least five vessels from Dutch ports, seeking cargoes of furs. One of them, it is said, commanded by Cornelius Mey, came that year down the New Jersey coast and entered Delaware bay, where Mey gave to the two capes the names which one of them for a long time, and the other permanently kept—Mey, the eastern, and Cornelius, now Henlopen, the western. This voyage may have been made in 1614, or it may not; it is at least quite as likely that Mey named the capes on a later voyage in 1623, of which we shall speak presently.

Of the ships at Manhattan in 1614, one, the Tiger, commanded by Captain Adrian Block, by some mischance was burned, and thereupon Block built, in the spring of that year, on the shore of Manhattan Island, "a little "yacht," to take her place. This was the Onrust—Restless—famous ever since, because by many she has been supposed to be the first sea-going vessel built by white men within the limits of the original Union. Really she was the second, and a mere cock-boat indeed, judged by modern standards, for her length was forty-four and a half feet, her width eleven and a half, and her capacity "eight lasts," about sixteen tons. Yet in craft not much larger mariners ventured on long voyages in those days.

Gustavus Adolphus

King of Sweden from 1611 to 1632, when he was killed in the battle of Lutzen. Born 1594. Photographed especially for this work by J. F. Sachse from a canvas in the Historical Society of Pennsylvania

THE PIONEER WHITE MEN

The Onrust was employed, her owners reported in 1616, "during the space of three years"—i. e. 1614, 1615, and 1616—in "looking for new countries, havens, bays and rivers." For such a purpose she served well. Sailing in her from Manhattan in 1614, Captain Block explored the coast eastward as far as Cape Cod, leaving Dutch names on land and water, his own for the small island at the eastern end of Long Island, where it yet remains. Then, promptly on completing his trip, he returned to Holland, and the Onrust was left to other commanders.

Two years later, it is supposed, another of the Dutch skippers, Cornelius Hendricksen, "of Munnickendam," brought the Onrust to the Delaware, and ascended in her the bay and river as far as the mouth of the Schuylkill. If he made such a voyage in 1616, it must have been early in the year, for on the 16th of August, that year, the owners of the Onrust petitioned the States-General of The Netherlands for a grant of privileges of trade, on account of the discoveries which they asserted Hendricksen had made in her, and which he, being himself then at The Hague, was called upon, in their behalf, to describe and verify.

It is not of great importance to the history of Pennsylvania whether Hendricksen's voyagings in the Onrust included such a visit to the Delaware or not. Yet in dealing with these beginnings of the State this episode, accorded respect by nearly all our historical writers, can hardly be passed over. Hendricksen's own statement, drawn up for the States-General, affords no good evidence that he ever entered the bay, or even visited the capes. His report, read August 19, 1616, is simply this:

"He hath discovered for his aforesaid Masters and Directors certain lands, a bay and three rivers, situate between 38 and 40 degrees. And did there trade with the inhabitants; said trade consisting of Sables, Furs, Robes and other Skins. He hath found the said country full of trees, to-wit: oaks, hickory, and pines, which trees were in some places covered with vines. He hath seen in the said country bucks and does, turkeys and partridges. He hath found the climate of the said country very temperate, judging it to be as temperate as that of this country, Holland. He also traded for and bought from the inhabitants, the Minquas, three persons, being people belonging to this Company, which three persons were employed in the service of the Mohawks and Machicans, giving for them kettles, beads, and merchandise."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

It is perplexing to read this report—so vague, so general, so wanting in particulars which would make it certain that Hendricksen had really explored the Delaware. But we must take it as it is, and decide, by the study of other evidence, what its significance ought to be. One word in it fixes our attention, "Minquas;" as for the trees, furs, vines, birds, and animals, they might have been found over a wide area of country besides that on the Delaware. Minquas, as we have learned, was the Dutch name for the Indians of the Susquehanna region, who came at times in war-parties to the Delaware. Except for this word it could as readily be believed that Hendricksen's "bay and three rivers" were on the coast of New Jersey, or between Cape Henlopen and Chincoteague.

But the owners of the Orrust, in their petition, referred to a "carte figurative," a map, which they had placed on file. This, they said, exhibited the field of Hendricksen's discoveries. Let us turn to this. What map was it? In 1841, Mr. John Romeyn Brodhead, agent of the State of New York, searching the Dutch archives at The Hague, found two maps which seemed to have been submitted to the States-General about the time we are considering, one of which was probably the map referred to. One of them, on paper, was larger than the other; the smaller was handsomely drawn on parchment. On the face of the paper map, inland, near the word "Minquaas," there is a memorandum, and this vaguely suggests, though it does not perfectly fit, Hendricksen's statement that he had ransomed from the Minquas, on his voyage, three employes of "the Company." This memorandum, translated, runs as follows:

THE PIONEER WHITE MEN

"N. B. Of what Kleynties and his comrade have communicated to me respecting the locality of the rivers and the position of the tribes which they found in their expedition from the Maquaas in to the interior and along the New River downwards to

James I

King of England, 1603-1625. Photographed especially for this work from a rare print in possession of Charles P. Keith the Ogchage (that is to say the enemies of the aforesaid Northern tribes), I cannot at present find anything at hand except two rough drafts of maps partly drawn with accuracy. And in deliberately considering how I can best reconcile this one with the rough drafts communicated, I find that the places of the tribes of the Sennecas, Gachooks, Capitanasses, and Jottecas ought to be marked down considerably further west into the country."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Obviously this memorandum is the confession of the conscientious Dutch map-maker that the materials given him for his inland work are impossible to be brought into satisfactory order. The allusion to "Kleynties and his comrade," or comrades, has interest and probable significance. They made, it seems, an expedition; it was from the Maquaas—Mohawks—into the interior, then along the New River—a Dutch name, among many, for the Delaware—and downward to enemies of the Maquaas. This would reasonably be a trip from the Mohawk country into that of the Lenâpé—Algonkian enemies of the Iroquois—or into the country raided at times by the Susquehannocks.

This larger map, the paper one containing the memorandum, is much more than the other a map of the Delaware bay and lower river, though very incorrectly drawn in many particulars. It shows a bay, unnamed, nearly where the Delaware bay should be; into its west side, low down, flows a river, which comes from far in the north, where it issues from a large lake, "Versch water," close to a river flowing eastward to the Hudson—evidently the Mohawk. On the west bank of the long river, above the bay, perhaps in the neighborhood of the Christiana, or Schuylkill, are indicated Indian lodges, with the name "Minquaas," attached; again, further up, on the east side, under the memorandum already quoted, this name "Minquaas" appears again.

Was this paper map the one on which the Ourust owners relied? It is impossible to say.¹ Neither of them is dated. The parchment map would naturally be thought the later one, for it presents more geographical detail, and is drawn with more precision. On it the coast-line from middle New Jersey to the Penobscot river is presented with tolerable accuracy, many place

¹Mr. Brodhead ("History of New York," I., 757, 758), thinks it was—that it was a new map in 1616, prepared at that time, after Hendricksen's return from the Delaware to Holland, for the express purpose of supporting his owners' claims. But it was the parchment map that was attached to the memorial. And Mr. Brodhead himself (presumably) has placed on the bottom of the reproduced parchment copy (see "Documents Relating to the Colonial History of New York," I., 13), a memorandum that it was the one that showed Hendricksen's discoveries.

THE PIONEER WHITE MEN

names being given. It embodies, no doubt, the results of Block's cruise eastward from Manhattan, in the Onrust, in 1614. Far down in the left-hand corner, the entrance to Chesapeake bay is shown, and its capes are marked. But as to the lower Delaware it offers nothing which we can identify. Between Sandy Hook and Cape Charles it shows no real bay whatever. It suggests no Delaware capes, and has no names of any—despite Mey's reputed visit to and naming of them in 1614. A short, narrow, straight river, unnamed, is shown coming directly from the west, and entering the sea less than halfway down the New Jersey coast. Higher up on the map, however, there appear the upper reaches of a river. This river ends abruptly; it is cut squarely off, connected with nothing, its downward course suspended in air. On its bank is the indication of an Indian town and the name "Minquaas." This is nearly westward from Manhattan, and if strictly construed should signify the neighborhood north of the Lehigh's junction with the Delaware.

We have dwelt upon these maps because they are the earliest New Netherland cartography. Both show that up to 1616 little was known to the Dutch concerning the Delaware region. The data for it given the draftsman were evidently meagre and confused.

Historical works on Pennsylvania have accepted as conclusive the evidence that Hendricksen ascended the Delaware, "landed at several places, took soundings, drew charts, and discovered the general contour of the bay, and the capabilities of the river." It has also been taken as proved that three white men, employés of the Dutch Company at their fort near Albany, having left the Hudson Valley and reached the headwaters of the Delaware—or Susquehanna—had fallen into the hands of the Minquas (Susquehannocks), and being found by Hendricksen on the Delaware, were ransomed by him, at the place where Philadelphia now stands, or at the site of Wilmington.

It can only be said that putting together all the evidence, these statements are probably justified. The report of Hendricksen, the memorandum on the map, and the collateral facts, point to such a conclusion as reasonable. It seems probable that the parchment map, notwithstanding its larger scope and fuller geographical detail, was the earlier; that it was drawn in 1614, upon the return of Adrian Block to Holland, and probably was used then to display his explorations; while the paper map was drawn in 1616 to show the region of Hendricksen's voyaging. As has already been said, the paper map suggests some knowledge of the lower Delaware, while the parchment one does not.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The States-General, whether on account of their wish not to arouse the English by too obvious a claim to regions which might belong to Virginia; or because the formation of the Dutch West India Company was in view; or because they doubted the reality or value of Hendricksen's voyage; or for some other reason, did not grant the Onrust's owners the trade monopoly they asked to "the bay and three rivers." Their High Mightinesses pondered over the skipper's report and the merchants' petition, postponed action on them, took them up again, postponed them again, looked at them a third time, and finally postponed them once more; and there the record ends.

It is to be said, of course, that if the Company's employés, "Kleynties and his comrade," or comrades, made the journey downward from Albany to the neighborhood of Philadelphia or Wilmington, by a route west of the Delaware, in the spring of 1616, they were nearly the earliest white visitors to Pennsylvania. Brulé probably left Carantouan in the autumn of 1615, and so preceded them but a few months.

Interest in the trade to America increased in the Dutch cities; the ambition of Netherlands statesmen and merchants for a firm hold in the New World became more definite. In June, 1621, the charter of the West India Company, whose plans had been for some time maturing, was granted by the Dutch government. The Company received by it the sole right, during twenty-four years, to trade to the African coast between the Tropic of Cancer and the Cape of Good Hope, and to the American Coast between the Bay of New Foundland and Straits of Magellan.

THE PIONEER WHITE MEN

Under the West India Company's authority, in 1623, Captain Cornelius Mey came again to America, and proceeded to the South River—the Delaware. He certainly ascended the bay and river, for either in that year or 1624 he built at or near where Gloucester now stands, on the New Jersey shore, a trading post, Fort Nassau. His operations doubtless brought him within the waters of Pennsylvania; if we lack confidence in the account of Hendricksen's visit, we must regard Mey as the first of the pioneers to the river front of the State.

Fort Nassau, a log structure, capable of defense against bows and arrows, sufficient for a depot of furs, but badly situated to command the commerce of the river, was the first place definitely occupied by white men on the Delaware. It stood for nearly thirty years, until 1651, and in that time was the center here of Dutch authority and trade. To it the New Jersey and Pennsylvania Indians, Lenâpé of many bands and local designations, brought their peltries to exchange for articles that served their use or pleased their fancy, or for rum that made them drunk.

The most careful study of all the shreds of evidence left to us fails to settle with certainty the precise site of Fort Nassau. So also are we unable to say whether it was not, time and again, partly or wholly abandoned in intervals of the fur trade. Manhattan was the seat of the Dutch authority, the capital of New Netherland, and the colony there seldom had strength to spare from its own affairs. In 1625, we are told by Wassenaar, "the Dutch had determined to abandon it and remove its occupants to New Amsterdam (Manhattan), to strengthen the latter colony, and avoid expense, a resolution they carried out, though they did not relinquish their trade with the Indians, but occasionally sent a yacht to the vicinity of the Fort." Four couples, "who had been married at sea," and eight seamen, were sent from Manhattan to the Fort, in 1623 or later; and another post was established at that period, it is said, on Verhulsten's Island, up the Delaware, "near the Falls" (identified as Stacy's Island, near Morrisville), where "three or four families of Walloons" remained for a time, procuring furs from the natives.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

We note, now, in the year 1626, an isolated fact, whose interest for us will presently appear. This was the appointment, and arrival at Manhattan in that year, May 4, of a new Director-General, Peter Minuit of Wesel. We shall soon hear of him in our field. The affairs of New Netherland, including the South River, were under his direction until the autumn of 1632. It was he who, soon after his arrival, "purchased" the island of Manhattan, "eleven thousand morgens," or about twenty-two thousand acres of land, of the Indians who had their gathering place there, "for the value of sixty guilders," say twenty-five dollars of modern money.

Up to 1631 no white man had made a settlement on the west bank of the Delaware. In that year there came to the southern cape, Cornelius, now Henlopen, a party of colonists sent out from Holland by David Petersen DeVries, the finest figure with whom this story of the pioneer time has to deal, a man energetic, humane, and intelligent. We learned little of the Delaware from Hendricksen and Mey; DeVries will furnish us a lucid account.

DeVries's party sailed from the Texel on the 12th of December, 1630, in the ship Walrus, commanded by Captain Peter Heyes, or Heyson, of Edam. There were on board "a number of people and a large stock of cattle." They came by the West Indies, the common route for ships in that day, and arriving in the early spring of 1631, landed near where the town of Lewes and the great breakwater now are, built a substantial house, surrounded it with palisades, and began their settlement. They intended to carry on a whale-fishery, and to cultivate "all sorts of grain" and tobacco. A few weeks later, the Walrus sailed on its return to Holland, and Gilles Hosset, or Osset, who had come out as "commissary," was left in charge of the colony.

Henry Hudson

Navigator; entered what is now Delaware bay August 28, 1609; discovered the river called Hudson September 3, 1609; discovered bay bearing his name 1610. No authentic portrait of Hudson exists, but the above is generally believed to be a correct likeness

THE INDIANS

This was Swanendael—Valley of Swans—first settlement undertaken on the west side of Delaware bay or river, and destined, alas! to a brief and disastrous experience. The year after the settlement was made, DeVries agreed with his associates in Holland, the “patroons” concerned in Swanendael, to go out himself. He was now a man of nearly forty; he had been born at Rochelle in France, in 1593, of Dutch parents who returned to Hoorn when he was four years old. His home was at Hoorn; he had married at twenty-seven, or earlier, and had made other voyages before this, in which he had proved his skill and courage. With two vessels, a “yacht,” the Squirrel, and a larger ship, he now left the Texel May 24, 1632, to be in good time at his colony, for the winter fishery. The whales, he understood, “came in the winter, and remained until March.”

As he was leaving Holland bad news reached him—that Swanendael had been destroyed by the Indians! The expedition proceeded, but the voyage was long. Going by the Madeira islands, Barbadoes, St. Vincent, St. Christopher, it was the 5th of December when they reached Cape Corneilius; and found the melancholy report only too true! On the 6th he went ashore to see the desolate place. The palisaded house “was almost burnt up.” “I found,” he says, “lying here and there, the skulls and bones of our people, and the heads of the horses and cows which they had brought with them.” No Indians were visible, but “the business being undone”—as was sadly plain—he “came on board the boat, and let the gunner fire a shot to see if we could find any trace of them.” The next day some appeared.

In the conferences that followed DeVries obtained some explanation of the disaster. It seemed to have been the result of misunderstanding, as is often the case when blood is shed. An Indian who was induced to remain on board the yacht all night the 8th of December, rehearsed the story. The Dutch had set up, as the sign of possession, a piece of tin, bearing the Netherland arms. An Indian carried off the tin “for the purpose of making tobacco pipes." The Dutch complained of this, and some one or more of the Indians, designing, it would appear, to enforce law and order with vigor, put the offender to death. Then his partisans, totemic brethren, no doubt, executing swiftly the blood revenge, fell upon the settlers when they were unsuspecting and unprepared, and slew them all, thirty-two persons. Was it Commissary Hosset's fault? He died with the rest. From DeVries's report of the Indian's story there was no reason to blame him. But the colony was ruined.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

DeVries did not "chastise" the natives, nor send out "punitive expeditions;" more bloodshed would not heal the wounds already made. With a view to future fishing, he exchanged some goods with them, and made an engagement of peace. Then, taking six men in the Squirrel, and leaving the ship at anchor inside the cape, on the 1st day of January, 1634,¹ he proceeded up the river—on his guard now, as his narrative shows, whenever an Indian was met. On the 6th he was at Fort Nassau, "the little fort," he says, "~~where formerly some families of the West India Company had dwelt.~~" It was now deserted, except by Indians. Suspicious of these, he received with extreme caution their overtures to trade. Some of them, he mentions, "began to play tunes with reeds," and speaking of a "canoe" he adds, "which is a boat hollowed out of a tree." For four days he remained near the Fort, always wary and watchful. An Indian woman, a Sankitan, warned him not to haul his yacht into the narrow Timmer-kill, lest he should be surprised there, and told him that not long before the Mantes, of "Red Hook" (our Red Bank), had "killed some Englishmen who had gone into Count Ernest's river in a sloop," a story which seemed supported when he found some of the Mantes protected against the January cold by "English jackets" which they wore. Afterward, in Virginia, he heard that a party had been sent from there in September to explore the river, and had not returned.

No one, however, now hurt a hair of the heads of DeVries or his men. It seems doubtful whether the Indians had any hostile intent. They persisted in overtures for friendly trade, and brought him beaver-skins for presents, declining gifts from him, because that would make it a mere exchange. Eventually he traded with them, "duffels, kettles, and axes," for "Indian corn of various colors," and some skins. On the 10th (January), he drifted his yacht off on the ebb-tide, anchored at noon "on the bar at Jacques Island," and on the 11th reached the Minquas kill (our Christiana), and on the 13th rejoined his ship at Swanendael.

¹New Style.

THE PIONEER WHITE MEN

A second time, however, he ascended the river. Putting some "goods" for trade into the yacht, he sailed again on the 18th, and next day came within a mile of Jacques Island, where he hauled into a creek, with two fathoms of water at high tide. Here ice began to trouble him. But he thought it "a fine country." "Many vines grow wild, so that we gave it the name of Wyngaert's Kill." "Went out daily while here," he adds, "to shoot. Shot many wild turkeys weighing thirty to thirty-six pounds. Their great size and fine flavour are surprising. We were frozen up in this kill from the 19th (January) to the 3d of February. During this time we perceived no Indians, though we saw here and there at times great fires on the land, but we saw neither men nor canoes, because the river was closed by the ice."

Jacques Island has been identified as Little Tinicum, opposite the greater Tinicum which is part of Delaware county. The kill in which he lay was therefore Ridley, or perhaps Chester, creek. In either case we have here a visit to Pennsylvania made definite, and the land itself described.

Getting clear of ice on February 3d, they sailed once more up to the Fort, but found no one, white or red. It "began to freeze again," so a second time DeVries took the Squirrel to the west shore for shelter. They "hauled into a little kill over against the Fort," a stream which must have been within the present limits of Philadelphia, perhaps Hollander's Creek. Here they lay until the 14th. For several days no Indians came, except one woman, who brought maize and beans, of which DeVries bought "a parcel."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

But on the 11th Indians appeared—and an ill-looking party! They came across the river from the Fort, on the ice, pulling their canoes. There were “full fifty” of them, and they proved to be not the natives of the region about, but dangerous strangers, a war-party of “Minquas,” who, DeVries says, “dwell among the English of Virginia”—probably our Susquehannocks, whose habit he was unable to know very exactly. He says they were “six hundred strong;” but perhaps this means the fighting strength of the tribe, not of this particular war-party. DeVries feared they meant him ill, and regarded his escape from them, which he presently effected, as a deliverance to be thankful for—all the more when on the 13th three neighboring Indians came timidly to him, and related their sufferings at the hands of the Minquas. Ninety of the Sankikans, they said, had been killed by them. Next day the weather was milder, the ice in the kill and river softened, and DeVries was glad to get the Squirrel out and away toward the capes. On the 20th he reached there, safely, and soon after sailed for Virginia.

“This is a very fine river,” he says in his account, “and the land all beautifully level, full of groves of oak, hickory, ash and chestnut trees, and also vines which grow upon the trees. The river has a great plenty of fish, the same as those in our fatherland, perch, roach, pike, sturgeon, and similar fish. . . . We fished once with our seine, and caught at one draught as many as thirty men could eat. . . . In winter time, from Virginia to Swanendael, there are hundreds of thousands of geese, both gray and white. The country is also full of wild turkeys, and has a great many deer.”

Five years lay between the departure of DeVries and the arrival of the Swedes. In these years the Dutch continued their trade on South River, practically undisturbed. Controversies between the West India Company and some of its prominent members, the “patroons”—Van Rensselaer, and others—over the great grants of manorial lands which the latter had secured on the

David Pietersen DeVries

Leader of a colony of traders and emigrants from Holland, who settled on the Delaware river in 1633

THE PIONEER WHITE MEN

Hudson and elsewhere, and on which they claimed freedom of trade with the Indians, in competition with the Company, caused the recall of Minuit to Holland. He left Manhattan in the spring of 1632, and his successor, Wouter Van Twiller, did not arrive for a year. It was in this interval of authority that the South River was neglected, and Fort Nassau left, as DeVries found it, unoccupied. Van Twiller, however, when he reached Manhattan, soon sent over a new "Commissary," Arent Corssen, who arrived within a few weeks after the departure of DeVries. He was instructed to build a new house, and make repairs, and furthermore to establish a hold on the west bank of the river, where it was now plain that trade with the Indians of the interior must naturally centre.

That the Commissary made such a purchase in that year, 1633, on the west bank, where Philadelphia now stands, was claimed afterward by the Dutch. They produced in 1648 a deed of confirmation, by which Amatehooran, Sinquees, and five other Indians declared they had previously sold "the Schuylkill and adjoining lands" to Corssen. On the ground thus acquired, Fort Beversrede, which will be mentioned hereafter, was said to have been built.

While the Dutch held the trade of the river, they were not without visitors. Two of these, Englishmen, Captain Thomas Yong, or Young, and his nephew, Robert Evelin, came in July, 1634, in a ship which had left Falmouth, in England, in May. Their voyage appears connected with the curious episode of the grant of "New Albion" to Sir Edmund Plowden, by Charles I., and this story may as well be related here. In many of our histories Sir Edmund appears as a mythical personage, a sort of blending of Baron Munchausen and Don Quixote, yet he was a man of actual flesh and blood, and the facts ascertained concerning him can be plainly told. He was of a family in Shropshire, Catholics, and about the time that Charles I. gave Lord Baltimore the Maryland grant, but a little later, he gave to Plowden a grant also of a "county palatine," vaguely described, but interpreted to mean a tract lying between Maryland and the Hudson River, partly the country then held by the Dutch. It would have included, apparently, the whole of the Delaware region, and most of

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Portrait of Charles II

On charter granted to Penn; King of England, 1660-1685

New Jersey. A patent, in Latin, making this grant, is on record in Dublin, witnessed by the Deputy-General for Ireland, June 21, 1634.

It is presumed that Sir Edmund Plowden was then living in Ireland. He was one of the Catholic party, probably, in the controversies that were gathering about the king. The grant, it seems, had the royal privy-seal, but never "passed" the great seal of crown authority. Upon it Sir Edmund assumed, as far as he could, the dignities of a "lord palatine," and formed and announced large, if vague, plans. In 1641, "Master Robert Evelin," who had been to the Delaware with Yong, in 1634, published in England, a "Direction for Adventurers, and Description of New Albion," in the form of a letter addressed to Sir Edmund's wife, and in 1648 this was republished in a tract, often cited by historians, "Description of New Albion," etc. Evelin seems to have desired to forward the plans of Plowden.

THE INDIANS

William Penn's autograph and seal on the Charter of 1683

In 1641, Sir Edmund came to America, and for seven years stayed usually in Virginia, coming to the Delaware district in 1643 certainly, and possibly at other times. His visit in the year named is described particularly in a report of Governor Printz, then the Swedish Governor on the Delaware, who relates also the narrow escape Plowden had from death on an island near Chincoteague, where he had been "marooned" by his ship's crew. But after all nothing practical came of "New Albion." It was a paper state, and nothing more. Plowden never established his claims, either by law or by force, and never entered into possession of his county palatine. Of all the many settlers whom he alleged to be on the way to occupy it, of all the lords, ladies, knights, gentlemen, and adventurers who, he professed, had resolved to remove hither, none actually appeared. In 1648 he returned to England, and in 1655 he made his will, in which he called himself "of Wansted, in the county of Southampton," and also "Lorde, Earle Palatine, Governour, Capitaine Generall of the province of New Albion in America"—phrases which did no one any harm, and made the wording of the will sound more impressive. In 1659 he died, but as late as the period of the American Revolution some infatuated persons thought they might secure land in New Jersey on the basis of his "palatine" grant.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

We return, now, to Yong and Evelin, and their visit in 1634. It is strongly suggested by all the circumstances that this was a voyage to spy out the land in the interest of Sir Edmund Plowden. The dates point to this. In September, 1633, Charles I. had given Yong a sort of "roving commission" to go forth and discover lands in America, not "actually in the possession of any Christian prince." Coming first to the Chesapeake, Captain Yong appeared at the Delaware capes on the 24th of July, 1634. He may have been unaware of the extent of the Dutch occupation, and very possibly may have heard rumors of the abandonment of Fort Nassau; at any rate, he seems to have thought the region answered the description of his commission. He renamed the river Charles, after the king. Sailing slowly up, he and his companions were at the Schuylkill on the 22d of August, remaining there five days, and on the 20th reached shoal water at the "Falls," near Trenton, where they also encountered some "Hollanders of Hudson's River," who were inclined not to do them violence, but to impress them that they were trespassers. Later, Evelin is said to have explored the New Jersey coast, and then to have returned and made a further attempt to get up the Delaware above the Falls; the old idea of a short passage to China and the Indies seems to have been vaguely in the minds of himself and his uncle. Evelin was a brother of George Evelin, who was connected with Claiborne, the Maryland "rebel," in the settlement and enterprises at Kent Island on the Chesapeake.

THE PIONEER WHITE MEN

Captain Yong made a report to Secretary Windebanke, in England, of his observations on this trip on the Delaware. He thought it a fine river. "The quantity of fowle," he said, "is so great as can hardly be believed, wee tooke at one time 48 partridges together as they crossed the river chased by wild hawks. . . . There are infinite numbers of wild pigeons, blackbirds, Turkeys, Swans, wild geese, ducks, teals, widgions, brants, herons, cranes, &c., of which there is so great abundance as that the rivers and rockes are covered with them in winter . . . for my part I am confident that the River is the most healthfull, fruitful and commodious River in all the north of America to be planted."

One of the vague and shadowy stories connected with Yong and Evelin is that they built, or began to build, a fort on the Delaware, at a place called by them "Eriwomock." In the "New Albion" description of 1648 it is said that the Dutch, "hearing that Captain Young and Master Evelin had given over [abandoned] their fort, begun at Eriwomeck," etc., etc. From the description, historians of New Jersey would place the fort on the east bank of the river, at the mouth of Pensaukin creek, near Camden. A more probable site is on the west side, within the present limits of Philadelphia. That it existed at all is questionable; that it had no influence of importance upon the course of affairs on the Delaware is quite certain.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Some of Evelin's descriptions are of interest. He speaks in high praise of the abundant wild life on the bay and river. "I saw there," he says, "an infinite variety of bustards, swans, geese and fowl, covering the shoares, as within the like multitude of pigeons, and store of turkies, of which I tried one to weigh forty and sixe pounds. There is much variety and plenty of delicate perch and sea-fish, and shell-fish, and whales, or grampus; elks, deere that bring forth three young at a time. . . The barren grounds have four kindes of grapes and many mulberries, with ash, elms, and the tallest and greatest pines and pitch trees that I have seen. There are cedars, cypresse, and sassafras, with wild fruits, pears, wild cherries, pine-apples, and the dainty parsemenas,"—persimmons, no doubt.

Arms of Penn

He made an estimate of the number of Indians on the Delaware. "I do account," he says, "all the Indians to be eight hundred, and are in several factions, and war against the Susquehannocks, and are all extreme fearfull of a gun, naked and unarmed against our shot, swords, and pikes. . . Since my return eighteen Swedes are settled there, and so [also] sometimes six Dutch doe in a boat trade without fear of them." He thought it needless to build a fort, "where there is no enemy," and in reference to the danger from the Indians adds: "for note generally twelve English, with five foot calivers, shoot thirty pellets, or dagge shot, and fifty yards' distance, and the naked Indian shooteth but one arrow, and not thirty yards' distance. . . And therefore fair and far off is best with Heathen Indians; and fit it is to reduce all their trading Posts or Palisadoed trucking-houses, and to kill all straglers and such spies without ransome." Which would seem to indicate that the Indians had no need to wish to exchange their Dutch neighbors for the company of Master Evelin!

THE PIONEER WHITE MEN

More alarming to the Dutch than the visit of Yong and Evelin, or the claims of Sir Edmund Plowden, was a demonstration of force from Virginia. DeVries, when he left the Delaware in 1633, went to Jamestown, and there in conversation with the Governor, Sir John Harvey, probably disclosed what he had found—or not found—at Fort Nassau. The consequence was that two years later the acting governor of Virginia, Captain West, thought it a good move to send and seize the river. In August, 1635, he dispatched an armed party, about fifteen men, from Old Point Comfort, under Captain George Holmes, who reached Fort Nassau, found it practically or entirely undefended, and summarily took possession. One of the party, however, deserted, and hurrying across country, bore the startling news to Manhattan. Van Twiller perceived the critical situation and sent an armed vessel with a sufficient force, who promptly retook the place. Holmes and his men were carried prisoners to Manhattan, and thence were sent back to Virginia just in time to stop a second party coming to reinforce them at Fort Nassau.

Had England not been, at this moment, in the political distractions which preceded her Civil War, these occasional spyings and surprises would have taken a more definite and systematic form. When Minuit went home from Manhattan in 1632, his ship was driven by bad weather into the English port of Plymouth. There she was seized upon the charge of illegal trading within the dominions of King Charles. After earnest protestations from the Dutch, and negotiation for several weeks, the ship was released, but the English ministry then declared that England claimed the region occupied by the Dutch, upon a title derived from "first discovery, occupation and possession," that she regarded title from the Indians as of no value, they not being "bona fide possessors" of the land, capable of making a conveyance for it. The Dutch were flatly told that if they would "submit themselves as subjects" to His Majesty, they might remain in New Netherland, but that otherwise his interests would not permit them to "usurp and encroach upon" his colonies.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

This was notice that at a convenient season—which in time came—the stronger power would oust the weaker. The claim of original discovery, from the dubious voyages of the Cabots, covered a vast deal of ground in England's interest.

And here we may close this period of discovery of the Delaware. We have seen the river in the possession of its native people, and we have seen the east bank occupied by the Dutch pioneers, with an abortive attempt to occupy the west bank. At the end of 1637 practically nothing had been done toward actual settlement and cultivation; the Holland people had come for trade, and that only. A new period of development was at hand.

CHAPTER III

THE SWEDES: THE FIRST SETTLEMENT IN PENNSYLVANIA.—

1638-1655

SENDING out her first expedition to the Delaware in 1637, Sweden expressed in it the partial accomplishment of a cherished plan. Since 1624 she had been desirous to secure a trade with the New World, such as Spain had so long possessed, and the Netherlands had lately been acquiring. In the autumn of that year, at Gottenberg, the king, Gustavus Adolphus, gave audience to a somewhat unpractical but very earnest adventurer, William Usselinx, formerly a merchant of the Netherlands, and the man who had been there most active in urging the organization of the Dutch West India Company. The outcome of this interview was the king's approval of a Swedish Company for the same general purpose as the Dutch; a commission issued to Usselinx authorized its organization "for trade to Asia, Africa, America, and Magellanica."

In this scheme, indicative by its swelling phrase of the men who had designed it, the persistent though ruined Antwerp, and the generous, somewhat romantic monarch, lay the germ of the New Sweden of Delaware and Pennsylvania. In 1628 the first formal charter for the "South Company" was granted.

The undertaking, however, dragged. Usselinx wore out his influence in Sweden, as he had done in the Netherlands, by persistent importunity. Sweden was poor; the Thirty Years' War was raging; Swedish sailors and ships were few, and familiar only with neighboring seas; at the death of Gustavus, in November, 1632, nothing of practical importance had been accomplished. He had indeed heartily approved the plan; if it languished during his absence in the wars it revived when he returned to Stockholm;

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Lord Baltimore

Proprietor of Maryland; born about 1582; died 1632. Photographed especially for this work from an old engraving he hoped to increase the wealth of his country by the profits of exterior commerce, and to train at the same time a body of seamen who might even cope upon the great oceans with those of Spain. It was at Nuremberg, in the last of his conferences with his wise and trusty counsellor, the Chancellor Axel Oxenstiern, that he considered afresh the whole plan, and expressed his approval of a new and enlarged charter, designed to enlist the interest of the North German and other cities. Three weeks later he fell at Lutzen—at the very time when the ships of DeVries were approaching the Delaware.

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

Upon Oxenstiern, burdened with all the other difficult affairs of Sweden, devolved the execution of the American scheme. Faithful to the thought of Gustavus in this as in other particulars, he was himself heartily in favor of it. No statesman of his time viewed more sagaciously the problem of Europe's relations with the New World. But the times were unpropitious; he was forced to wait five years, until practicable plans could be matured. Late in the autumn of 1637 two ships at last left Sweden for America. They were under the command of Peter Minuit, he who had been the Dutch company's director at Manhattan from 1626 to 1632. The expedition was bound, not to the Guinea Coast, or fabulous regions in the South Sea, but to the South River. The western side of this river, as Minuit knew, had remained unoccupied by Europeans since the abandonment of the Colony of DeVries at Swanendael, and he undoubtedly knew and appreciated the advantage for the Indian trade of occupancy upon that shore.

The two ships were the Kalmar Nyckel, a man of war, and the Gripen, a sloop. The crews and cargoes were from Holland; of the three-score persons in the expedition not more than a half-dozen were Swedes. Capital for it had been secured in equal parts from Holland and Sweden. In the latter country Oxenstiern had raised 12,000 florins, and in Holland a group of persons, headed by Minuit and Blommaert, connected with Swedish interests, had provided a corresponding sum. The whole enterprise was therefore a private venture; nothing of the "South Company" of 1626, or the enlarged company of 1633, appeared in it, except that this was at last a resolute effort to express in action something of what had so long been under discussion.

After leaving Gottenburg, baffling winds detained the ships in the North Sea, but about the end of December, after having refitted and obtained more provisions at the Dutch port of Medemblik, they quitted the familiar shores and took the ordinary southern route across the Atlantic. Toward the end of March they had entered the Delaware. Though it was scarcely spring, the river seemed beautiful to men who had left the north of Europe in the depths of winter, and one place at which they briefly landed, perhaps the mouth of Mispillion creek, they called "Paradise Point." Passing on upward, they cast anchor at last where a large stream came in on the left hand—the Minquas-kill of the Dutch. Here the ships lay while Minuit went ashore to confer with the Indians. He knew well, of course, the story of the catastrophe at Swanendael, and realized that above all he must avoid the conditions which had caused it.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The Indian chief whom Minuit now met was Mattahoorn, the same who has been mentioned as joining in the conveyance of the lands on Schuylkill to Corssen, the Dutch agent. Apparently he was the principal sachem of the region. He had his lodge near the Minquas-kill. He claims our remembrance both because he seems to have been a worthy character, and because he is practically the only one of the Lenâpé distinguishable by name before the time of Penn. Other Indians of the Delaware in the early period are a mass, in which none has individuality.

Mattahoorn was probably an elderly man. He was living, however, thirteen years later, for he joined in a Council held at Fort Nassau, in July, 1651, by Stuyvesant, the Dutch governor. It is possible that Minuit, from his acquaintance with the trade on the South River during his administration at Manhattan, may have had some previous knowledge of the chief. There was no difficulty in concluding an agreement. Minuit explained what he wanted—ground on which to build a "house," and other ground on which to plant. For the former he offered "a kettle and other articles," for the latter half the tobacco raised upon it. Mattahoorn seems to have yielded cheerfully, as the Indians generally did until they began to see that land taken by the whites passed from common enjoyment into private and exclusive use. The land for the planting was defined to be, as Mattahoorn afterward said, that bounded "within six trees"—marked, no doubt, by the surveyor, as "line trees." Thereupon the ships came up the kill, which later became known as the Christina, in honor of the girl queen at Stockholm, and passing on the right hand the mouth of a clear and rapid stream, the Brandywine of our day, reached a natural wharf of rocks and fast land which rose from the lower ground, and formed a landing-place so bold that the ships came alongside in deep water. Here they disembarked all that was intended to remain, and the erection of a place of security, which Minuit named Fort Christina, was quickly begun. The time was the beginning of April; it was alike the season for planting and for trade with the Indians for the skins of animals taken during the winter. As to this, Minuit had carried out his plans effectively.

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

Reports of the new arrivals on the river quickly reached the Dutch. Fort Nassau was at this time occupied, and the Commissary there sent his assistant, Peter Mey, to observe Minuit's operations. Mey accomplished little. Minuit, according to his report, said he was on a West Indian voyage, and was getting wood and water. Shortly after, when the up-river observers made a second visit, they found the strangers remaining, and that they had made a garden, in which plants were set out; while upon a third visit, they had "made a settlement," and built a fort. These reports, covering little more than a month, show the order and the promptitude of Minuit's proceedings.

There was now a new Director-General at Manhattan, Willem Kieft, successor to Van Twiller. He had reached his seat of government nearly at the time the Swedes came to Minquas-kill, his ship, the Herring, an armed vessel belonging to the West India Company, arriving on the 28th of March.¹ Kieft was naturally disturbed over this intrusion. He wrote on the 28th of April to the Company in Holland, reporting the situation. A few days later, probably May 6, he addressed to Minuit a formal ¹This is the Dutch date, and is "New Style." In the Swedish calendar, it would have been March 18.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

protest against his settlement, declaring that both banks of the river belonged to the Dutch. "The whole South River in New Netherland," he declared, "has been many years in our possession, and has been secured by us with forts above and below, and has been sealed with our blood, which has happened even during your direction of New Netherland, and is well known to you."

This claim by the Dutch to the west bank was based, of course, on DeVries's adventure at Swanendael. Minuit apparently made no formal reply, but the practical answer was that the settlement there was wholly abandoned, and that no white man had for over six years been living on the west side of the river. Paying no attention to Kieft, he pushed work on his fort. He knew that his force was equal or superior to any the Dutch could then send from Manhattan, and that besides it was not the present policy of Holland to offend a power like Sweden, whose generals and soldiers were bearing the brunt—as they had done since 1630—of the Protestant cause in the still continuing Thirty Years' War. The fort was regularly laid out by Mans Kling, a Swede and an engineer, who was apparently second in command, and was called Fort Christina. So it continued to be known until Stuyvesant's bloodless siege and capture, seventeen years later.

Minuit proceeded energetically to other work. One or two log-houses were built. The goods for the Indian trade were landed. A store of Indian corn and meat was collected. A second treaty with the Indians for the purchase of land was made, extending down the river and bay, and northward as far as the Falls at Trenton. Posts were set up with the letters declaring the Swedish Queen's sovereignty, "C. R. S." The Gripen was sent to Virginia to dispose of her cargo, but being refused permission to do so, returned still laden, though she was allowed to stay ten days to procure wood and water. By midsummer Minuit was ready to return to Europe. On July 31, Kieft wrote to the Company, "He has departed with the two vessels he had with him."

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

Twenty-four persons in all were left at Christina. They were under the command of Mans Kling, with Hendrik Huyghen as "commissary," to conduct the trade with the Indians. The party thus formed the first permanent settlement by white men on the Delaware bay or river, on either side. It was the beginning of what is now a large and prosperous city, and the kernel as well of a sovereign State.

Calvert Arms

The labors of Minuit closed here. He had sent the Gripen first to the West Indies; he followed himself in the Kalmar Nyckel. Reaching St. Kitts, he sold his merchandise, bought tobacco, and was on the eve of sailing for Sweden, when a hurricane burst upon the roadstead and drove all ships out to the open sea. He, as it chanced, had been visiting on board a Dutch vessel, the Flying Deer, and this was lost. Neither it nor he was ever seen again. The Kalmar Nyckel rode out the storm, and came back for him, but in vain. Giving him up at last, she was forced to resume her homeward voyage.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

New Sweden, at the very outset, thus suffered a hard stroke of fortune. Minuit was a capable leader. He was much the ablest man who had yet been sent to the South River, unless we except DeVries, and as Director-General at Manhattan he had proved himself superior to either Van Twiller or Kieft. He had been born, probably about 1580, at Wesel, on the right bank of the Rhine, and hence was a man nearly sixty years old at his death.

The Kalmar Nyckel had a long voyage home. Going first to Holland, she did not reach Gottenburg until June of the following year, 1639, with her tobacco. Meantime the Gripen had sold her cargo in the West Indies, had returned to Christina, loaded there the furs which Huyghen had secured, and after a marvellously quick voyage of five weeks had returned to Gottenburg in May.

The Swedish colony on the Delaware, the "New Sweden" to which so many hopes and endeavors had been given, had a lifetime of but seventeen years—1638 to 1655. Yet it was of large importance, because it was the actual and systematic beginning of the life of white people on the west bank of the Delaware. And out of it came the first planting of Pennsylvania. A year before William Penn was born, the Swedes had already begun the settlement of the State which was to bear his name.

We know little with certainty as to the individuals who composed the company of twenty-four whom Minuit left at Christina. Two of them, Mans Kling, the engineer, and Hendrik Huyghen, the commissary, have already been mentioned. Kling became later a familiar figure on the Delaware, and Huyghen we shall meet again. Ten others have been identified who came either with Minuit or two years later, 1640, in the "Second Expedition" from Sweden. We shall speak of six of them here. They demand our attention, because a little later they had their homes up the Delaware from Christina, north of the Pennsylvania line, and hence were among the first white settlers in Pennsylvania.

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

One of the number was Anders Svensson Bonde. He was born in Sweden in 1620, and so was but eighteen if he came with Minuit, or twenty if he came in 1640. In 1644, the records show, he was at Tinicum, in what is now Delaware county, Pennsylvania, employed in "making hay for the cattle" and in sailing the Governor's "little yacht." In 1648 he was gunner at the fort, New Gottenburg, which Printz built on Tinicum Island, and in 1680 he was living at "Kingsess"—Kingsessing—in what is now West Philadelphia. On the first Tax List of Philadelphia county, 1693, he appears as the richest man west of the Schuylkill. He lived probably until 1696, a widow, Anneka, and six sons and four daughters surviving him. His descendants changed the family name to Boon.

Peter Andersson was engaged similarly with Bonde, in 1644 and 1648. Anders Larsson Daalbo, was in 1644 cultivating tobacco for the Swedish Company, on a plantation "near the Schuylkill." Sven Larsson was engaged in 1644 similarly to Daalbo.

Peter Gunnarsson Rambo was cultivating tobacco for the Company in 1644, in Christina, and came later into Pennsylvania. He held several offices under the Dutch and English governments on the Delaware, and died in Philadelphia county in 1698, being, it is said, the last survivor of those who came in the first two Swedish expeditions, 1638 and 1640. He had four sons and two daughters, all of whom married and left descendants.

Sven Gunnarsson is a notable figure. He was occupied as Rambo, in 1644, but he and his three sons, known as Swensons, later Swansons, obtained in 1664 from Alexander d'Hinojossa, then the Dutch Governor on the Delaware, a patent for land above Moyamensing-kill, within the present city of Philadelphia—at Wicaco, after called Southwark. These Swansons are well known figures in the early history of Philadelphia. Their cabins were standing at Wicaco when Penn came in 1682, though the father had died a little earlier. He, when he came to the Delaware, in 1638 or 1640, was probably accompanied by his wife, and if so she was the first white woman who came to live permanently on the west side of the Delaware.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The fur trade engaged, of course, the early efforts of the Christina settlers. They planted, the first year, we may be sure, or even the second, very little. By peaceable means they drew the trade of the Indians of the region, and doubtless of those on the Susquehanna. Their Dutch neighbors and competitors at Fort Nassau watched them with increasing dissatisfaction. The reports sent to Manhattan, and thence by Governor Kieft to Holland, tell a doleful story of the early success of the Swedes in capturing the trade. The injury done the first year to the Dutch, Kieft writes in one letter, is thirty thousand florins; in another he flatly says that the Company's trade in South River is "entirely ruined." He charges the Swedes with paying higher prices, with giving presents, and in general with out-doing the traders at Fort Nassau.

Meanwhile the Swedes looked for another ship from home. It was two years before one came. The Kalmar Nyckel, after her bad news of Minuit's loss had been digested, had been ordered to return, and Peter Hollender, a lieutenant, a Dutchman, and perhaps a "knight," since he added "Ridder" to his name, was commissioned governor in Minuit's place. But the ship had many detentions, including a leak and a dishonest captain, and it was February of 1640 before she got away, and April 17 of that year before she again sailed into the Christina. How gladly she was greeted may be imagined. She brought, it is believed, the first minister of the gospel on the Delaware, the Rev. Reorus Torkillus, a clergyman of the Swedish Lutheran church.

The rule of Peter Hollender as Governor of the Swedes, and so of all others on the West Bank of the Delaware, extended from April, 1640, to February, 1643, when his successor, John Printz, arrived. The events of this period may be succinctly stated. The Kalmar Nyckel, quickly loaded with furs, sailed for home in

Peter Stuyvesant

Governor of New Netherlands when what is now Pennsylvania was owned by Holland;
born 1602, died 1682

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

May (1640), and arrived in July. At the beginning of November of the same year there arrived at Christina, from Holland, the ship Fredenburg, with a company of Dutch colonists, headed by Jost de Boghardt. They were mostly from Utrecht, and being unable to agree, as it seems, with the Dutch West India Company, had obtained permits and a grant of privileges from the Swedish authorities. They settled south of Christina—at New Castle, as some think, perhaps further down the river, in what are now St. George's and Appoquinimink hundreds.

The English again made their appearance on the river in 1640. This time they came from New England, from the Colony of New Haven. That young town had large ambitions and corresponding energy. One of its citizens, George Lamberton, trading to Virginia in his bark, the Cock, in the winter of 1638-39, had learned of the fur-trade of the Delaware, with which nothing at New Haven could compare. It was resolved thereupon to make a settlement on the Delaware, and late in 1640, Captain Nathaniel Turner was sent from New Haven to open the way. He, it is said, and also a little later Captain Lamberton, already named, secured land from the always-obliging Indians, the purchase including much of the east bank of the bay, from Cape May northward, and besides this a tract at Passyunk, within what is now Philadelphia. To occupy the New Jersey purchase a move was promptly made: a colony of some sixty persons left New Haven and settled at Varken's kill, near the present town of Salem, and about the same time, as the English later claimed, "a fortified trading-house was built or occupied at Passyunk." If this latter statement has validity, it would seem that it might be connected with the alleged activities of Captain Thomas Yong and Master Robert Evelin, who professed, as we have seen, to have been building an English fort somewhere on the river, about 1640 or 1641, and perhaps may have been concerned in some work at Passyunk.

This English enterprise, however, did not seriously disturb either the Dutch or Swedes. It came to an end at Varken's kill in less than three years, and the Passyunk enterprise also failed. We shall mention these collapses in their proper place.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Hollender wrote to Sweden that his people at Christina were too few, and that they were little skilled in husbandry or handicraft. Indeed his letters to Chancellor Oxenstiern speak of them with painful candor; "no more indifferent people are to be found in all Sweden than those who are now here," he says in one place. Perhaps they thought equally ill of him. We shall see, as we proceed, that governors and people, like schoolmasters and scholars, were apt to see each others' faults very distinctly. An insufficient supply of horses and cattle was one of the troubles at Christina; we are not to forget that whatever domestic animals they had must be brought in ships, either from other American colonies or from Europe.

The "Third Expedition" from Sweden (the Fredenburg with her Dutch passengers not being counted), came to the Delaware sometime in 1641. The precise time seems obscure. It consisted of two ships, the Kalmar Nyckel once more, and a consort, the Charitas. They brought a considerable company of colonists, including numerous Finns. Names of some of these colonists have been preserved. Among them was Lieutenant Mans Kling, who had gone home in 1640, and who was now accompanied by his wife, and their little child, and a maid. Another who came at this time was Olaf Persson Stillé, ancestor of a family of distinction in Pennsylvania, including the late Dr. Charles Janeway Stillé of Philadelphia. He was a settler, soon, at the mouth of Ridley creek, in Delaware county.

The fourth, and the most important, of the several Swedish "expeditions" came in 1643. It may be regarded as expressing the highest endeavor of the Swedes. There were again two ships, the Fame and the Swan. John Printz, bearing a commission to succeed Hollender, was in command. Leaving Gottenburg on the first day of November, 1642, and taking the usual southern route, they touched at the island of Antigua to celebrate Christmas, came

"I'm-sympathetic to their proper rights, but the people are called in his name. Ours, even so-called people, are not here," he said.
 "I'm him. We sh not, who illust very, distinct some of the trad ever domes, e together. An from Sweden (the first being counted), came to express the sorrow of some of the Alouette men, and light a considerable company of Indians. Names of some of the Alouettes were given in the report who were killed, and a list of Alouettes seen since the report of a man who told Dr. Charles that he had shot, soon, at the John Trintz, bearing a common name, was again the one who was aboard. Leaving Gotterbarm, he was heading for the island of Antigua to celebrate Christmas.

Engraved by W. Kenton after the original by Sir Godfrey Kneller into Delaware Bay in a storm the following month, and February 15, 1643, reached Fort Christina.

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

Printz, it may be here said, is the most conspicuous figure, if we except Minuit, connected with New Sweden. Lively descriptions of him have come down to us, as we shall presently see. He had been an officer, a lieutenant-colonel of a cavalry regiment engaged in the Thirty Years' War, and being charged with making an inadequate defense of the city of Chemnitz—which, however, he declared due to the inhabitants—had been dismissed the service, but afterwards restored. His instructions, now, for the Delaware administration, were elaborate. He was to deal with the English at Varken's Kill, and the Dutch at Fort Nassau peaceably, if possible; to treat the Indians with humanity, protect them, and "civilize" them—especially to sell them goods at lower prices than the English or Dutch. He might choose his residence as he saw proper, at Cape Henlopen, Christina, or "Jacques Island" (Tinicum); but he must particularly see that his fort should command the river, and have a good winter harbor for vessels. The sowing of grain, the planting of tobacco, the increase of cattle, and sheep, the inspection of the fur-trade, the manufacture of salt, the culture of the vine, search for metals and minerals, the fisheries, especially for whales, silk-culture, etc., etc., were among the many matters commended to his attention. "Before all," he was to see that the worship of God was maintained, taking "good measures" that the divine service was "performed according to the true Confession of Augsburg, the council of Upsal, and the ceremonies of the Swedish Church."

How many came with Printz it is impossible now to say. His company included his wife, their daughter, Armgard, and a minister, the Rev. John Campanius. The names of some twenty-three others have been preserved. Some were soldiers, others clerks, mechanics and farm laborers. A large part were from Finland. The opening of spring found Printz busily at work. He lost no time in carrying out his instructions. Proceeding up the river from Christina, he decided to make the seat of his authority at Jacques Island, the place called by the Indians Tenacong, and since Tinicum. Not, however, on the island in the stream, our "Little Tinicum," but on the larger one which is now practically part of the mainland. Here he built at once a "fort," so called, of "heavy green logs," laid "the one on the other," and mounted on it four brass cannon. This he called Nye (new) Gottenburg. He made thus the first settlement by white men in Pennsylvania. Besides this, he sent Kling to make a settlement on the Schuylkill. "Log houses, strengthened by small stones" were built there, and a tobacco plantation begun. The Dutch, it is said, had broken up, in 1642, the English post there, a force sent across from Fort Nassau under Jan Jansen Van Ilpendam, the Commissary, having ejected the Englishmen. Later, Kling built on the east bank of the Schuylkill, near its mouth, probably on what was afterward called Province Island, a small fort which was called New Kors-holm. Of this fort Printz says in his report, sent home in February, 1647, that it "is pretty nearly ready."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

These operations of Kling, the plantation and the fort, form the first well-authenticated occupancy of white men of the site of the city of Philadelphia. Their beginnings date certainly from the spring of 1644; probably from 1643.

Printz, however, was not content with the forts already described. A third, called Elfsborg, was built, in 1643, at Varken's kill (Salem) on the east side of the Delaware, near the post which the English colonists from New Haven had established. These adventurers had not prospered. Sickness had sorely beset them. The Dutch harassed them. The fur-trade to be secured in that locality was small. And besides, the mosquitoes tormented them. By the end of 1643, their colony was practically broken up and abandoned. "Slowly, through the winter and spring of 1643-44, the major part of them straggled back to New Haven."

At Tinicum the Swedish settlements now centered. The fort at Christina was small, and its situation gave it no command of the Delaware. That at Tinicum—New Gottenburg—on the contrary, dominated the river, and nearly destroyed the importance of the Dutch Fort Nassau. In the three or four years following Printz's arrival Tinicum gradually assumed the character of a hamlet. The island was confirmed to him as his personal estate by the Swedish Council at Stockholm, acting in the Queen's name, November 6, 1643, and he built later, probably in 1646, a mansion-house for his own residence, calling the place Printzhof. A church was also built, which Campanius dedicated September 4, 1646. This was the first house of Christian worship within the limits of Pennsylvania. Attached to it was a burial ground, where many of the earlier settlers were interred.

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

The situation on the Delaware, in the autumn of 1643, is described for us by our old friend DeVries. It had been ten years since he left the river, in the spring of 1633. He had been mainly at Manhattan, meanwhile, and now, being on a trading voyage to Virginia, his ship came up the Delaware. He says in his journal:

"The 13th (October), sailed by Reed Island, and came to the Verckens-kil, where there was a fort constructed by the Swedes, with three angles, from which they fired for us to strike our flag. The skipper asked me if he should strike it. I answered him, 'If I were in a ship belonging to myself, I would not strike because I had been a patroon of New Netherland, and the Swedes were a people who came into our river; but you come here by contrary winds and for the purposes of trade, and it is therefore proper that you should strike.' Then the skipper struck his flag, and there came a small skiff from the Swedish fort, with some Swedes in it, who inquired of the skipper with what he was laden. He told them with Madeira wine. We asked them whether the governor was in the fort. They answered, No; that he was at the third fort up the river, to which we sailed, and arrived at about four o'clock in the afternoon, and went to the governor, who welcomed us. He was named Captain Prins, and a man of brave size, who weighed over four hundred pounds. He asked the skipper if he had ever been in this river before, who said he had not. How then had he come in when it was so full of shoals? He pointed to me, that I had brought him in. Then the governor's koopman, who knew me, and who had been at Fort Amsterdam, said that I

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Augustine Herman

A native of Bohemia; received a grant of 20,000 acres of land at head of Chesapeake bay from Lord Baltimore, in 1660. A surveyor of note was a patroon of Swanendael at the entrance of the Bay, destroyed by the Indians in the year 1630, when no Swedes were known upon this river. He (the governor) then had a silver mug brought, with which he treated the skipper with beer, and a large glass of Rhenish wine, which was given to me. The skipper traded some wines and sweetmeats with him for peltries, beaver-skins, and stayed here five days from contrary winds. I went once to Fort Nassau, which lies a mile higher up, in which the people of the West India Company were. I remained there half a day, and took my leave of them, and returned at evening to the Governor of the Swedes.
After a painting by West

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

"The 19th, I went with the governor to the Minckwas-kil, where their first fort was, and where there were some houses. In this little fort there were some iron guns. I stayed here at night with the governor, who treated me well. In the morning, the ship was lying before the Minckwas-kil. I took my leave of the governor, who accompanied me on board. We fired a salute for him, and thus parted from him; weighed anchor, and got under sail, and came to the first fort, which was not entirely finished; it was made after the English plan, with three angles close by the river. There were lying there six or eight brass-pieces, twelve-pounders. The skipper exchanged here some of his wines for beaver skins.

A handwritten signature in cursive script, reading "David Lloyd". The letters are fluid and connected, with a large initial "D" and a prominent flourish at the end of the word "Lloyd".

Signature of David Lloyd, speaker of the Assembly, 1694

"The 20th of October, took our departure from the last fort, or first in sailing up the river, called Elsenburg. The second fort of the Swedes is named Fort Christina; the third, New Gottenburg."

Printz remained governor of New Sweden for more than ten years. He came, as we have seen, in the spring of 1643; he went back to Sweden in the autumn of 1653. His rule thus covered much more than half of the life of the Swedish colony. The events of his time are of interest to this history, in that they show the beginnings of Pennsylvania. In this decade the bare shelters of the first comers became tolerable cabins; the slender stock of horses and cattle increased; the crops grew in amount and importance; families became "settled," and began to feel that this was indeed their home. There was thus a slow but definite evolution of permanent occupancy.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Agriculture had been one of Printz's chief objects, as was natural and reasonable. He could hear of no gold or silver mines, nor of salt deposits, and he thought the culture of silk doubtful, but he planted corn extensively, and after a failure the first year did well with it. Tobacco plantations were begun. Hay was cut from the meadow lands. Rye for bread and for seed was procured at Manhattan, in 1643, and a few cattle. In the autumn of that year rye was sown, and next spring barley; the crop grew so well "it was delightful to behold."

The year 1643, however, was on the whole a hard one. The little colony was sorely stricken by disease. No less than nineteen of the male population, a large proportion indeed, died that year. "They had hard work and but little to eat," Printz said. Among the dead was the Rev. Reorus Torkillus, the minister at Christina, who died in February, a few weeks before Printz's arrival. According to Campanius he had married since coming to the Delaware, and left a widow and child.

In March, 1644, the Fame, one of the two ships which had come with Printz, arrived a second time. She brought, unfortunately, but few colonists. One of them (he had been here earlier, and now returned) was Johan Papegoia, who soon married the governor's daughter, Armgard. The Fame sailed for Sweden in June, taking a cargo of 2,142 beaver skins, and 105 hogsheads of tobacco. Printz sent by her a report of the colony's condition; it had, he said, 90 men, "besides women and children."

Indian troubles threatened this year. The shocking and unpardonable cruelties of Kieft, the governor at Manhattan, in which hundreds of the natives, up and down the Hudson, and on Long Island, of all ages and both sexes, were slain, disturbed the Indians far and near. All along the Atlantic coast word spread among them of the cruelty of the new-comers. In the spring two white soldiers and a laborer were killed on the Delaware, below Christina, and later a Swedish woman and her husband—he English—were killed between Tinicum and Upland. We may note this latter event as the first white blood shed in Pennsylvania by the Indians. Printz assembled his people for defense at Upland (Chester). The Indian chiefs of the region came in, disowning the act, and desiring peace. The usual treaty was made, presents were distributed, and friendly relations were restored.

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

There was now a long period without a ship from Sweden. From the Fame's departure, in June, 1644, until October, 1646, none came. It was a trying time. The stock of goods for trade was exhausted, and no beaver or other skins could be secured from the Indians. At the beginning of winter, 1645, a disaster occurred. On the 25th of November, late at night, the fort at Tinicum was set on fire by a soldier, and was totally destroyed. "Not the least thing" was saved, "except the dairy." "The people escaped," Printz wrote, "naked and destitute. The winter immediately set in, bitterly cold; the river and all the creeks froze up," so that no supplies could be had until the middle of March, and Printz adds, "if some rye and corn had not been unthreshed, I myself and all the people with me on the island would have starved to death."

The want of goods for trading not only was unfavorable as to profits for the Swedes; it diminished the respect of the Indians for them. To this period may be assigned the Indian council described by Campanius, in which Mattahoorn presided, and the slaughter of the Swedish settlers was considered. The sachem is said to have presented the question: "The Swedes dwell here upon our land. But they have no goods to sell us. We can find nothing in their stores that we want. They have no cloth, red, blue, or brown. They have no kettles, no brass, no lead, no guns, no powder. The English and Dutch have all sorts of merchandise. Shall we go out and kill all the Swedes, or shall we allow them to stay?" The decision of the council was that the Swedes should not be molested. They should be, instead, "good friends." One warrior declared, "We have no complaint to make of them. Presently, they will bring here a large ship filled with all sorts of good things."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

This expectation was fulfilled when at last, October 1, 1646, the ship Golden Shark arrived. She had had a long and stormy voyage, with much sickness on board. She brought few colonists, but her cargo was a good one. No time was lost in notifying the Indians. Huyghen, the commissary, with Van Dyck, a sergeant, and eight soldiers, was dispatched by Printz "to the country of the Minquas." This was "five German miles" distant. "All sorts of presents" were given the Minquas, and a promise secured from them that they would trade "as before," Huyghen additionally assuring them "a higher price than the Hollanders."

The Golden Shark needed repairs, and work on her could not be completed until December. Then winter set in suddenly, and she was frozen up. She could not get away until February 20, 1647, when she sailed with a cargo which included 101 casks of tobacco, over a fourth of which had been raised by the Swedes—the remainder secured in trade. Printz sent back by her a long report. Since 1643, he said, the health of the people had been good; "only two men and two small children" had died. "The whole number of men, women, boys, girls, and children now living here is 183 souls." He had built a church at New Gottenburg—that dedicated by Campanius in 1646—"adorning and decorating it according to our Swedish fashion, so far as our limited means and resources would allow." He had also built a storehouse there. To break up the trade of the Dutch west of the Delaware, he had built "a fine house called Wasa," inland from Fort Korsholm, "by the road of the Minquas." It was

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE PROVINCE
OF PENNSILVANIA IN AMERICA;
Lately Granted under the Great Seal OF ENGLAND TO William Penn, &c.

Together with Priviledges and Powers necessary to the well-governing thereof.

Made publick for the Information of such as are or may be disposed to Transport themselves or Servants into those Parts.

LONDON: Printed, and Sold by Benjamin Clark
Bookseller in George-Yard Lombard street, 1681.

Title page of English book used to influence immigration to Pennsylvania

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

"so strong that four or five men, well provided with guns, balls and powder," could defend it, and he had settled there "seven freemen, sturdy fellows." A quarter of a mile (Swedish: over one and a half English), beyond Wasa he had built another strong house, and settled five freemen there, calling the place Molndal. Here he had set up a water mill, "which runs the whole year, to the great advantage of the country; particularly as the windmill formerly here, before I came, would not work, and was good for nothing."

These two places are worth particular identification. Wasa is supposed to have been the place known as "Kingsesse" (the township afterward Kingessing, now in West Philadelphia), on Karakung (Carkoen's), or Cobb's Creek. At Kingsesse, as we shall see, the last sitting of the Duke of York's "Court" occurred, in June, 1681, when the proprietorship of Pennsylvania was surrendered to the representative of William Penn. Molndal is better identified. It was long known as "the Swedes' mill." It stood on Cobb's creek, near the place where the old Darby road crosses the stream. It was the first water-mill erected in Pennsylvania—the first probably in a much wider region.

Some other items in Printz's report may detain us. He says there were two head of cattle here when he came, and that he brought three with him; these had increased to ten, and fourteen oxen and a cow had been purchased. And as "the freemen" needed more cattle for cultivating the land, he intended in May to buy some in Virginia. Mechanics of various sorts were needed, but above all "a good number of unmarried women for our unmarried freemen and others." The Magister, Campanius, wished to return home; at least two clergymen should be sent out. The goods needed for trade, both with the Indians and the other colonies, he enumerated: "clothing, shoes, linen cloth, thread, silk, fine and coarse cloth, divers drugs and colors for dyeing, buttons, Dutch ribbons, hats, belts, swords, tanned leather, etc." Such goods "are very vendible here and in Virginia and New England," he said, "and can be sold at a profit of one hundred per cent." A trusty man should be appointed to procure "zewandt" in New England, for this was the Indians' money, and trade could not be carried on without it.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

While Printz had been managing affairs for the Swedes fairly well, the situation at Manhattan had gone from bad to worse.

Original Seal of Chester County

Kieft's abominable wars with the Indians had continued until the Dutch were exhausted. "During five years"—to the summer of 1645—"New Netherland had known hardly five months of peace. Manhattan was nearly depopulated. In two years sixteen hundred savages had been killed; at Manhattan, and in its neighborhood, scarcely one hundred men, besides traders, could be found." Money there was none; the new church stood unfinished; church, school, and poor funds had been used for the war. All this was the result of Kieft's policy of "extermination," which DeVries had in vain protested against as both cruel and fatuous. It followed, of course, that the Dutch hold on the Delaware, never firm from the beginning, should be even more feeble during these evil years at Manhattan.

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

But in the autumn of 1645, the Indian troubles being composed, Kieft had sent over to Fort Nassau a new Commissary, Andreas Hudde, a more energetic and apparently a more honest man than his predecessor, Jan Jansen. The pressure of Dutch competition for the trade with the Indians west of the river began to be felt again. In June, 1646, a sloop came from Manhattan with goods, and Hudde sent her into the Schuylkill, "to wait for the Minquas." The Swedes, however, promptly ordered her to leave, and her captain, Juriaen Blancke, fearing the loss of vessel and cargo, departed. In September, Kieft ordered Hudde to get an Indian title to land on the west bank. This he proceeded to do, and set up there the "arms" of the Dutch West India Company, whereupon Huyghen, for the Swedes, took them down.

Still another change in the Dutch administration affected the face of affairs on the Delaware. The Golden Shark, with Printz's report of February, 1647, had little more than reached Sweden, when there arrived a new Dutch Governor, in succession to Kieft. This was Peter Stuyvesant. He reached Manhattan May 11, 1647. It was to be his work to receive the submission of New Sweden, and to make the surrender of New Netherland.

We shall hasten, now, with the events on the Delaware. A ship from Sweden, the Swan, came out in September, 1647. Papegoia, who had gone back on the Golden Shark, returned to Tinicum in her. He brought to Printz an order to remain as governor, instead of the release he had asked. New grants of land were made him—one of them, known as Printzdoorp, on the Delaware, south of Upland. The ship brought few colonists; only one, the Rev. Lars Carlsson Lock, is known to us. The Swan sailed for Stockholm in May (16th), 1648, and Magister Campanius, who had now spent more than five years at Tinicum, went in her.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Feeling that the key to the Indian trade was on the Schuylkill, Printz prepared in the winter of 1647-8 to place more buildings there, but Hudde, forestalling him, erected on the east bank of that stream, at Passyunk, not far from the supposed site of the Swedes' Korsholm, a strong place which he called Fort Beversrede. Thereupon, Kling, for the Swedes, "opposed the work," and cut down the trees about the new fort. Stuyvesant now sent agents from Manhattan to buy the land of the Indians once more. They held a council with Mattahoon and other chiefs at Passyunk, who "confirmed" the alleged sale of the lands there to Arendt Corssen, in 1633. Printz paid no regard to this; houses which two Dutchmen had begun to build on the tract were torn down, by his order, and in September (1648), he had a house built so close to Fort Beversrede, on the river side, as to render it practically useless for Indian trading.

Printz was thus "locking horns" with Stuyvesant. The struggle was unequal. The Swedish colony, though it had prospered, had grown but slowly. The colony at Manhattan, relieved from the strain of war, had begun to increase rapidly. In Europe the Thirty Years' war was over, and Holland's concern for the friendship of Sweden was abated. The imperious Stuyvesant was soon to make his power felt on the Delaware.

And at this juncture a dire misfortune befel the Swedes. To their earnest petition for more colonists, more arms, more supplies of a substantial kind, the government at Stockholm had at last endeavored to make an energetic response. A ship, the Cat, was fitted out; she took on board a commander, Hans Amundson Besk, with his wife and five children; sixty-three other immigrants, including a clergyman, a clerk, a "barber-surgeon," and some mechanics and soldiers; her cargo included eighteen cannon, of various sizes, and other weapons, and abundant ammunition, with rigging for a new ship intended to be built on the Delaware. It was the "eighth" of the Swedish "expeditions," one of the most important, and alas, the most disastrous! Its calamities made the fall of New Sweden sure; its safe arrival at Tinicum might have averted that event.

Penn's Treaty with the Indians

After a painting by West

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

In brief, the Cat, sailing from Gottenburg on the 3d of July (1649), was wrecked on an island near Porto Rico, on the 26th of August. The Spaniards pillaged the ship, and took the people to Porto Rico. A few remained there permanently; others got back, in one way and another, to Sweden; eighteen, still hoping to reach the Delaware, secured at length a small vessel, and venturously sailed from Porto Rico in May, 1651, but were captured by a hostile ship, and taken to the island of Santa Cruz, where all died but five. The commander, Amundson, with his family, being sent by the Governor of Porto Rico to Spain, got back at last to Sweden, to relate the dismal tale.

Printz had been looking for a ship, when word of this disaster reached him. There had been no arrival since the Swan departed in May, 1648. It was now midsummer, 1650. The bad news came to Manhattan; Governor Stuyvesant wrote of it to Hudde, at Fort Nassau, sending the letter by Augustine Herman, who was coming to the Delaware, and who, as a famous figure later in the history of Maryland, lord of "Bohemia Manor" on Chesapeake bay, is entitled to this special mention. Printz wrote at once to Sweden, sending his letter by a Dutch vessel. He spoke sadly of the loss of the Cat. Most of the settlers, he said, were "alive and well." They were generally supplied with oxen and cattle; the crops this year, 1650, had been very good, and the free farmers would have a hundred tons of grain to sell. His successor, whom he begged should be sent, would find things in good order. He had held "the best places," in spite of all opposition, though he had lost the Indian trade for want of goods.

Fresh collisions of Dutch and Swedes at Fort Beversrede brought matters to a crisis in the spring of 1651. In May, Stuyvesant sent from Manhattan an armed ship, which anchored in the Delaware below Christina. Printz finally drove her away—according to the Swedish account—but her captain's report to Manhattan brought Stuyvesant himself, overland, with a considerable suite, and a number of soldiers. An Indian council was held at Fort Nassau, and lands were once more obligingly sold by the sachems to the Dutch.* (It was here that Mattahoorn explained the sale he had made at Christina to Minuit in 1638.) Stuyvesant summoned Printz to show by what authority he claimed the position he held on the river, and the latter made the best reply he could, saying, inter alia, that the official documents were at Stockholm.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Stuyvesant then took a bold step. Abandoning Fort Nassau, as "too far up and too far out of the way," he built a new fort, on the west side, at "Sand Hook," now New Castle, Delaware, which he called Fort Casimir, and made it the seat of the Dutch on the river. The Swedish fort at Christina was thus in turn rendered practically useless. Printz protested, but his forces were inferior. According to the Swedish reports, which appear exaggerated, Stuyvesant had eleven ships to support him, four of them "well furnished" for fight. It is certain that the cost of this expedition and the erection of Fort Casimir was severely felt at Manhattan, and the treasury there was drained by it.

The situation was now strained, indeed, with both Dutch and Swedes struggling on the west bank of the river; rival posts on the Schuylkill, and hostile forts at Christina and Casimir. The appearance of peaceful relations, however, was maintained; Stuyvesant returned to Manhattan after interviews with Printz, in which they promised mutually to "keep neighborly friendship," etc. Printz wrote at once to Sweden, describing the events of the summer. He had again held conferences with the Indians, and had rebought lands on both sides of the river. He had abandoned the fort at Varken's Kill, Elfsborg, and maintained now only New Gottenburg, Korsholm, and Christina; these he had strengthened and repaired. The harvests had again been good, there were "delicious crops of several kinds of fruit;" the great needs were more people, "both soldiers and farmers," and these, he added, "the country is now amply able to sustain." His letter to Oxenstiern, August 1 (1651), is pathetic. "I have frequently," he says, "according to my duty, in the most humble way, reported to your Excellency whatever here occurred, asking for more people and means of defense; but, during the whole space of six years and three months, I have received no orders and not the first matter of assistance from the old country. Every day yet I am with great anxiety expecting it; for myself, too, I beg of your Grace to be released. God knows what I have suffered these three long years."

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

Efforts were made in Sweden to send another ship. The Swan was selected, but did not get off. Printz and his people still waited. It had now been—in the summer of 1652—over four years since the Swan went away. Not even a letter or message had come to them from Sweden. The colonists began to think they had been abandoned by the mother country, and some deserted. This year excessive rains spoiled the crops. Still Printz kept up a bold front; he had built the hull of a ship of about two hundred tons, and hoped for sails, rigging, and guns from home. In April, 1653, he again wrote. There were then "living and remaining" in New Sweden, he said, "altogether two hundred souls." Soldiers and others were discouraged; they had but "mean subsistence;" and they sought a chance "every day" to get away. It was now, he said, "five years and a half since a letter was received from home." He could not trade with the Indians, since he had no goods; besides, the Indians on the Susquehanna (the "Minquas") were at war. In the summer he sent his son Gustaf, a lieutenant, to Sweden to report, and finally in the fall, no ship and no letter having come, he resolved to go himself. The announcement of his purpose caused dismay; he assured the people, however, that he would either return within ten months, or would send a ship. He appointed Papegoia, his son-in-law, deputy governor, and with his wife, the commissary Huyghen, and some others, he left at the beginning of October, 1653, in a Dutch ship. England and Holland were then at war; it was the time of terrific naval battles in the narrow seas between the two countries; so the ship put in at Rochelle, in France, and the Swedish passengers landed there. Getting to Holland after a long delay, it was not until 1654 that Printz reached Stockholm.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Meanwhile the affairs of the colony had been once more earnestly discussed in the Swedish Council. The Queen, Christina, disliked affairs of state—she was a strange child of her great father—and the faithful pilot of Sweden, Oxenstiern, was near his end. But a fresh effort was resolved upon. Different ships were designated for the expedition, and there were delays and false starts, but at last on the 2d of February, 1654, the Eagle left Gottenburg for the Delaware. She had, it is said, no less than three hundred and fifty emigrants on board. It was the "Ninth Expedition."

In command of the company was Johan Claesson Risingh. He had been commissioned Commissary and Assistant Councillor to Governor Printz. No one in Stockholm yet knew that Printz was on his way home, and had landed two months before on the coast of France. Besides Risingh others of distinction were on the ship—Sven Schute, captain of the soldiers; an engineer, Peter Lindstrom, well known in our Delaware river history by his maps and plans; and two Lutheran clergymen, the Rev. Petrus Hjort, and Matthias Nertunius; the last named had been one of the distressed company on the unfortunate Cat.

The Eagle had an adventurous voyage. Danger seemed to be in the air. Half the emigrants were sick. The ship was dismantled by a hurricane. She narrowly escaped capture by Turkish corsairs. But the 18th of May (1654), she came inside the Delaware capes, and the hearts of the adventurers rose out of discouragement. They passed by ruined Elfsborg, and on the 21st cast anchor off Fort Casimir. This was held by a Dutch Commissary, Gerrit Bikker. He had twelve men. The Swedish ship had been seen coming up the river, and a boat sent down to reconnoitre returned with word that it "was full of people, with a new governor," and that they wanted possession of the fort, since it stood on Swedish land. The Dutch residents demanded that Bikker make defense; that commandant, in despair, asked, "What can I do? I have no powder!" An hour later, Schute and twenty or thirty of his soldiers landed, and Bikker went to meet them on the beach. The fort gate was open; the Swedes marched in. Fort Casimir was captured!

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

Belt of Wampum

Given to William Penn by the Leni Lenape Sachems at the Elm Tree Treaty at Shackamaxon in 1682. Photographed especially for this work by J. F. Sachse from the original in possession of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania

Risingh's written orders at Stockholm had been to secure possession of Casimir, if possible, by peaceable means. But he is said to have had other unwritten instructions, not to miss a good chance to seize it. He acted here on the verbal, not the written, orders. If peace had not just then been made (April, 1654) between England and Holland, so that a threatened invasion of New Netherland by men from New England was averted; and if the Dutch governor at Manhattan had been Van Twiller or Kieft, instead of the choleric, energetic Stuyvesant, the course taken by Risingh would probably have been justified by the event, but as it was, he could hardly have acted more imprudently.

Sven Schute was placed in command of the fort; its name was changed from Casimir to Trinity, for it was on the Trinity Sunday of the Lutheran calendar that the capture had been made. Of the dozen Dutch soldiers most were sent to Manhattan, and others, including Bikker, took the oath of allegiance to the Swedish queen. Risingh, in the Eagle, sailed on up the river, landed at Tinicum, and relieving the discouraged Papegoia, assumed the position of governor of New Sweden. Things were at a low ebb. After Printz's departure many of the Company's people had deserted. Only seventy colonists, according to Risingh, remained. With those who came on the Eagle, and the Dutch settlers who took the oath to Sweden, there were now 368. The fort at Korsholm, abandoned after Printz left, had been burned by the Indians.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Risingh now entered on a career of government which lasted sixteen months. He wrote to Stuyvesant at Manhattan, announcing and justifying his action. He convoked at Tinicum the Dutch and other settlers to take the oath of allegiance. He called the Indians together, also, in a council at Printz Hall, the chiefs, headed by Naaman, a sachem whose name is preserved in Naaman's Creek, near the circular boundary of Delaware, once more renewed the league of friendship.

He announced new regulations concerning "the people, land, agriculture, woods, and cattle." He invited back those Swedes who had gone to Virginia. A little town outside the fort at Christina was laid out by Lindstrom. The Trinity fort was reconstructed by Captain Schute, and four fourteen-pound cannon were taken from the Eagle to be placed upon it. The ship herself sailed homeward in July, with a partial cargo of tobacco.

But no energy of Risingh could permanently avail. A new disaster now befell. Another ship had been dispatched from Stockholm a few weeks after the Eagle. It was the Golden Shark, which had come out before in 1646. She left Gottenburg in April (1654), and touching at Porto Rico to give opportunity to her commissary, Elswick, for urging a claim on the Spanish governor for damages in the case of the Cat, reached the American coast in September, and then was steered, by design or stupidity, into New York harbor, instead of Delaware Bay. As she came up to Manhattan, Stuyvesant's eye must have shone with pleasure at sight of her flag. Here was his chance for reprisal! He seized her, of course, as offset to the capture of Fort Casimir, and as Risingh refused to come to Manhattan to treat for the restoration of the fort, he confiscated the ship as well as her cargo. Most of those who had come in her remained at New Netherland; the commissary, Elswick, at last reached the Delaware in November.

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

The Dutch West India Company had now sent orders to Stuyvesant to proceed to retake Fort Casimir. Hearing of his seizure of the Golden Shark, they wrote approving that, and notifying him that they would soon dispatch "one of the largest and best ships" of Amsterdam, carrying thirty-six guns and two hundred men, on whose arrival he was to proceed to the South river, in an energetic campaign against the Swedes. The ship, De Waag (The Scales), reached Manhattan early in August, 1655, commanded by "the valiant Frederick de Koninck." Stuyvesant was ill, but his subordinates pushed forward preparations for the expedition. August 25 was set apart as a day of fasting and prayer, to implore the Divine blessing upon it. Volunteers were called for, "at reasonable wages," with assurance that if wounded they should have "due compensation." Pilots were engaged, supplies of ammunition and provisions laid in, and three small ships were chartered. A French privateer happened to come into port, and she also was prevailed upon to join. The Jews of the town, declared exempt from military service, were mulcted in a stiff tax in lieu of it.

On the first Sunday in September,¹ "after the sermon" in the Dutch church at Manhattan, the expedition set sail. It was an imposing armada—seven ships, great and small, with "six to seven calendar, until 1753. By this, the Dutch expedition left Manhattan August 28.

¹This was the new, the Gregorian calendar, which the Dutch had adopted in 1582. The Swedes adhered to the old, the Julian,

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

hundred men," according to Risingh's report, or according to a Dutch authority, "three hundred and seventeen soldiers, and a company of sailors," which appears somewhat more probable. The next day they entered the Delaware, and on the following day they cast anchor before old Fort Elfsborg. Here the force was landed and reviewed, and "divided regularly into five sections, each under its own colors." The next day, the 31st of August, (O. S.) they proceeded up the river, and "about eight or nine o'clock" in the morning sailed past Fort Casimir. Schute's guns were silent. The ships went a little farther up, near the mouth of the Christina, and the troops were landed. They thus easily took position between the two forts, Christina and Casimir, cutting off their communications, and menacing the latter in the rear.

Risingh received word of the intended invasion, through the Indians, and by spies. He had strengthened Fort Casimir (or Trinity, as renamed), making the garrison forty-seven in number, and had ordered Commissary Schute to challenge the Dutch ships when they appeared, and to prevent their passage if possible. But the imposing array apparently paralyzed the commissary. So far as appears, he did nothing. The Dutch commander sent an officer, with a drummer, to demand his surrender. Schute asked time to communicate with Risingh at Christina, which was refused. Further parley followed, the Dutch closing in; a second and a third demand for surrender were made; finally, Schute begged for delay until the next morning, which was granted; and then about noon (September 1, O. S.), a "capitulation" was signed on the Dutch warship. The guns of the fort, nine altogether, were to be reserved for the Swedish "crown," and removed when convenient, and similarly "the guns and muskets belonging to the crown." The Swedes were to march out, twelve fully equipped, the remainder with their side-arms. Stuyvesant proclaimed that Swedes who would take the oath of allegiance to him might remain unmolested, and twenty did so. In a letter dated at Fort Casimir on the 12th September (September 2, O. S.), the Dutch commander reported to his council at Manhattan his complete success so far.

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

The surrender, Risingh's report says, was unknown to him until next day. His situation at Christina had become practically untenable. He had placed some of his best men in the captured fort, and an additional party, sent the day of the surrender, had been made prisoners on the way. He prepared, however, for resistance. "We collected," he says, "all the people for the defense of fort Christina, and labored with all our might by night and by day in strengthening the ramparts and filling gabions." September 2 (12th, N. S.), the Dutch appeared on the opposite side of Christina creek, and the siege began—the famous and bloodless siege which Washington Irving found so attractive and made so diverting a theme in his "Knickerbocker" history. There was, however, nothing humorous in the situation, to either of the chief combatants. The Dutch commander was in dead earnest; to Risingh the tragedy of the fall of New Sweden, now plainly impending, was all too real.

The siege need not be here described in detail. It lasted two weeks. On the 6th (16th, N. S.), of September, Stuyvesant sent a letter, "claiming the whole river." Risingh replied next day with a letter asserting the rights of the Swedes on the Delaware, and protesting against the Dutch invasion. Stuyvesant renewed his demand, and Risingh next urged that the boundaries between the Swedish and the Dutch colonies be settled by the governments at home, or by commissioners to be agreed upon. Nothing but delay resulted from their correspondence. Stuyvesant was sure of capturing the place, and was satisfied to wait; it would have been folly in Risingh, with his thirty men, some of them, he said, "ill affected," to have begun a fight. It resulted that in the two weeks no one on either side was killed, and no one was wounded. September 15 (25th, N. S.), Risingh surrendered. A formal "capitulation" was drawn up and signed by the two commanders on the "parade ground" outside the Fort.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The agreement resembled that made at Fort Casimir. The soldiers were to march out with the honors of war. The "guns, ammunition, implements, victuals, and other effects belonging to the crown of Sweden, and the South Company," in the fort or its vicinity, were to remain their property. The Swedish settlers might stay or go, as they chose, and for a year and six weeks, if they stayed, need not take the Dutch oath of allegiance. Swedes who remained should enjoy the Lutheran faith ("liberty of the Augsburg confession") and have a minister to instruct them. Risingh and the commissary, Elswick, were to be taken to Manhattan, and thence provided with a passage to Europe.

Stuyvesant, as this was concluded, had alarming news from Manhattan. After ten years of comparative peace, the Indians of the lower Hudson had risen again. Injuries done them had caused an outbreak, and the time had been seized when the Dutch fighting men were mostly away. Probably for this reason—if the story is true—Stuyvesant is said to have offered, after the capitulation, to restore Christina to the Swedes, "on honorable and reasonable terms," but this Risingh declined, preferring to abide by the "capitulation" made, and to trust to the adjustment which might come when the subject was taken up by the government at Stockholm against that at The Hague. Risingh then held a court-martial on Commissary Schute for his surrender of the fort—with what result is unknown—and presently, with others of the Swedish officials, proceeded to Manhattan on the warship, The Scales. From there they sailed—Risingh, Lindstrom the engineer, Elswick the commissary, and the two clergymen, Hjort and Nertunius—on Dutch merchant vessels early in November, and were landed in Plymouth, England, where a report of the Dutch conquest was made to Leydenberg, the Swedish ambassador to England. It may here be added that Sweden presently made claims upon Holland for her act in the overthrow of the colony, and might have pressed them with effect had not the king, Charles X., who had succeeded in 1654, on the abdica-

The Treaty Elm

Shackamaxon, Philadelphia, site of Penn's Treaty with the Indians, 1683. From the Birch views

THE SWEDISH SETTLEMENT

tion of Queen Christina, been absorbed during the next four years in wars with the Poles and the Danes. When he suddenly died in 1660, his son Charles XI. was a minor, and affairs were confused. Nothing but diplomatic claims and counter-claims had resulted up to 1664, when the whole of New Netherland was seized by the English. Then the claims of Sweden and Holland on the Delaware were substantially alike; both nations had lost their colonies; neither was likely to obtain much satisfaction from the other. The controversy thus faded away.

We must pause a moment to relate that one more Swedish "expedition," the "tenth" and last, had been sent out, which arrived after the surrender. This was the ship Mercury. She was in charge of the old commissary, Hendrick Huyghen, whom we first saw at Christina in 1638; and had on board also Johan Papegoia, who had been home to Sweden; a minister, Herr Matthias, and emigrants, making a party of eighty-four in all. Her cargo was chiefly linen and woolen goods and salt. She left Gottenburg in October, 1655, a few weeks after the fall of New Sweden, the event being unknown there, of course, and reached the Delaware in March, 1656. The situation being learned, she was taken to Manhattan by order of Huyghen, and her cargo sold; she reached Gottenburg again in September, 1656.

Though the war between Stuyvesant and Risingh was bloodless, it was not, according to the Swedish accounts, without some elements of rapine and destruction. Much injury was done the settlers, they declare, by the men from Manhattan. The fort on Tinicum Island was said to have been destroyed by them, but remains of it were visible long after. The wife of Papegoia, Armgard, the daughter of Printz, had her home on the island, at Printzhof, and in his report Risingh says the Dutch robbed her, during the siege of Christina, "of all she had, with many others who had their property there."

The Swedish colony, as a possession of Sweden, thus failed. In its hopeful inception, its unanticipated difficulties, its trials and struggles, its drain upon the mother country, and its ultimate catastrophe, it was an example of many such colonial undertakings. Most of them, the world over, have been a loss to those who directed them. The policy of the home government, though it seemed at times slack, was in the main consistent and persevering. The long intervals during which the colonists waited for a ship, or even a letter, were times in which the Swedish statesmen were engrossed in affairs more immediately pressing. To do her best, Sweden could have done little more. In the seventeen years she had accomplished this: she had actually planted a colony. The Swedes were settled upon the soil, and here they remained. The Dutch episode, of which we must next speak, did not displace them. William Penn found them here, doing well, and welcoming him heartily, when he came, twenty-seven years after Risingh's surrender.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

One of the most notable features of the Swedish chapter is that there were no wars with the Indians. The settlers lived amicably not only with their near neighbors, the Lenâpé, but with the more dangerous Susquehannocks. Whatever tedious sifting may be given to the long story of the so-called purchases of Indian title to the land, on both banks of the river, by the Dutch, the Swedes, and the English, down to 1655, the result of it all will be inconclusive as to the right acquired under any of them to an exclusive possession of the soil, but in the case of the Swedes one fact will plainly appear—the preservation of friendly relations with the natives. This was the consistent and patiently-pursued policy of the Swedes, and it was made completely successful. Contrasted with the bloody chapter of the lower Hudson, in Kieft's time, and even in Stuyvesant's, it makes a white page.

CHAPTER IV

THE DUTCH SETTLEMENT.—1655-1664

THE overthrow of the Swedish authority on the Delaware was complete and final. For a period of nine years the white settlements on the river, on both sides, remained wholly under control of the Dutch. Ships from Sweden, with letters of instruction prepared at Stockholm, were no longer watched for at Tinicum; the immediate seat of authority was at Manhattan, and the more distant one at Amsterdam and The Hague. The great man to whom all looked was the wooden-legged Director-General of New Netherland, whose energy and capacity had been so signally shown in his prompt conquest of New Sweden.

As for the Swedes they submitted—if not cheerfully, then perforce. Politically, their connection with their mother country was ended, but as we shall see, the old ties of religion and language were long cherished, and testimony to them appeared a few years later in the chain of churches on the Delaware which perpetuated the Lutheran faith and practice as ordained in Sweden.

Under the Dutch rule the settlements on the west bank of the river became more definitely segregated. The Swedes lived together, mostly north of Christina. The Dutch gathered about Fort Casimir, where a little hamlet sprang up, which became known as New Amstel—the New Castle of the English, and of our day. At New Amstel authority centered. Christina, renamed Altona (or Altena), was eclipsed, and Tinicum ceased to have importance except as the residence of Madam Papegoia and the location of a church. The log forts at both places rotted down, and were not rebuilt.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

From Christina, after receiving Risingh's surrender, Stuyvesant hastened back to Manhattan, to array the colonists there against the Indians. He left Ensign Dirck Smith in temporary command at Fort Casimir, but sent over in a few weeks John Paul Jacquet to be Vice-Director and administrator of the Dutch authority on the Delaware. Full instructions were given him—among other things to confine the trading on the river to Fort Casimir, where it could be guarded and controlled; to prevent the sale of rum to the Indians; to keep a watchful eye on the Swedes, and send away any who might be disaffected; and to maintain and protect the Reformed religion, according to "the word of God, and the Synod of Dordrecht."

Jacquet had been in the service of the Dutch East India Company in Brazil. Coming now to Fort Casimir, he found but a feeble settlement there, a dozen families or so, and the fort itself fallen into decay. It needed renewing, he reported, "from the bottom," to be of any use against an enemy. Fortunately none was in sight. Some of the Indian sachems came to ask better prices for furs, and to suggest that this was a proper time to make them presents, but they made no threats and gave no trouble. As for presents, Jacquet thought it worth while to raise a subscription to secure them, and one hundred and eighty-nine guilders were contributed, all the settlers "cheerfully" joining but two.

Jacquet, however, had scarcely been settled at New Amstel when an important change occurred. The West India Company had been obliged to borrow money, and one of its chief creditors was the City of Amsterdam, which had especially advanced funds to fit out Stuyvesant's armada of conquest the preceding year. The Company therefore arranged (July, 1656) to sell to the City of Amsterdam all its claims to territory on the west side of the Delaware, from the south side of Christina kill to the place now known as Bombay Hook. The sale being completed, the City appointed its own Governor, Jacob Alrich, and dispatched him with three ships and a company of colonists. The largest of the three, the Printz Maurits, in which Alrich sailed with many of the colonists, was wrecked (March, 1657) on the coast of Long Island, and though those on board escaped with their lives, it was not without suffering and loss. At the outset the Amsterdam enterprise was thus dampened.

THE DUTCH SETTLEMENT

With one hundred and eighty "souls," sixty being soldiers, Alrich reached New Amstel at the end of April, 1657, and entered upon his duties, displacing Jacquet. His authority covered nominally only the territory from Christina to Bombay Hook, the remainder being still the West India Company's colony, but practically, for a time, he was the chief official on the Delaware, subject only to Stuyvesant at Manhattan.

He was not long in finding out the difficulties of his position. The fort, Casimir, had continued to decay, until at last no visitor, especially one who might sometime be an enemy, was allowed to go about it to detect its weakness. The Dutch colonists had made little progress in agriculture, and their crops were small. It happened now that in two seasons there were alternations of severe drought and excessive rain. In the summer and autumn of 1658 a general sickness, an "ardent fever," prevailed. The "barber-surgeon" died, and also Christian Barents, who had come to erect a much-needed mill to grind meal. "In great distress for bread and corn" the colony was, Alrich wrote to Stuyvesant. In the midst of these troubles, a ship arrived from Holland, bringing no supplies but a hundred people, many of them sick; ten or eleven had died during the long voyage, and three more succumbed after arrival.

Stuyvesant came himself, in May, 1658, to inspect the situation on the Delaware, especially to investigate charges of smuggling, and complaints of various sorts. At Tinicum he conferred with the head men of the Swedes—their sheriff, Van Dyck; their magistrates, Olaf Stille, Mathys Hanson, Pieter Rambo, and Peter Cock; the captain, Sven Schute, and others. These took the oath of allegiance to the Dutch authority, and preferred a number of requests, most of which Stuyvesant granted. A further petition that if war should occur between Sweden and the Dutch Republic, they might remain neutral, and not be obliged to serve against their mother country, he acceded to, likewise.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

As already said, the Dutch settlers had made slow progress in agriculture. The winter of 1658-9 set in early, and continued long, causing "great distress." The excessive rains in the autumn "prevented the collection of fodder for the creatures," and the prevalent fever "curbed us down," says Alrich's letter to Stuyvesant, "so that all the labor in the field was abandoned." "From the first," he adds, "of the few Netherland settlers who actually lived here at our arrival, scarce one has obtained during our residence one schepel of grain. . . The time the first year, of those who came with us, was spent in building houses and making gardens. . . The summer passed without having thrown much seed into the ground."¹ Just before the winter began, the colony's "galiot" was sent to Manhattan for food, but was frozen in there, and, to crown all misfortunes, a yacht that had been dispatched by Stuyvesant, laden with "pork, beef, maize, etc.," had a treacherous skipper, who ran away with the ship on a voyage of privateering. Altogether, "a large number of men, and not a small number of cattle" died. "We will devoutly pray our Lord," writes Alrich, "and hope that our sins may cease, and then the chastisements may also diminish."

With Alrich there had arrived, in April, 1657, as a member of the colony, one who deserves special mention, as the first schoolmaster on the Delaware. This was Evart Pietersen. Our ¹"Not yet being able to go to Virginia or to the North," he adds, "our granary, and larder, and trust has been only at the Mannattans."

THE DUTCH SETTLEMENT

knowledge of him is scanty, but he was sent out to be the "school-master, comforter of the sick, and setter of the psalms." He found, he wrote, twenty families at New Amstel, all Swedes but five or six. In August of that year he reported that he had a school of twenty-five children. This was the germ of the schools and colleges of Delaware and Pennsylvania—the beginning of them all.

There is frequent mention of commerce in bricks. They were brought from brickyards at Manhattan to New Amstel for the chimneys of the new houses, there and at Altona. The ship De Meulen (The Mill), which had brought from Holland the ill-provided company at the end of September, 1658, had bricks as part of her cargo. But earlier than that, 1656, we find Jacobus Crabbe presenting a petition concerning a plantation near New Amstel, "where brick and tile are made and baked." The live stock increased slowly. Many allusions are made to the subject in the reports. Horses and cattle were sent from Manhattan, or bought in Virginia, and it was a practice to place them among the farmers—mostly the Swedes—to be kept for their use and part of the increase. Cattle appear to have been driven overland from Manhattan, in at least one instance. Goats are mentioned, at one time, with a demand that they have a keeper. At another, the swine are to be yoked, or may be in default killed by the soldiers. Alrich writes, 1657, that they are "few in number and wild;" also that he has himself but two cows which give milk. Oxen and horses are much needed, he says, those he has being "feeble and weak." Three persons have arrived, he reports in a later letter, with about forty cows, and these he has bought at 128 to 130 guilders apiece.

The fur-trade is not much mentioned, but it was probably vigorously maintained, and of importance. In 1657 there was a "general meeting" of settlers at Fort Casimir, and the prices to be paid for furs were agreed upon and signed by about thirty persons: for a "merchantable beaver" two fathoms of seawan (wampum); for a "good bear's hide, to the value of a beaver," the same; for an "elant's hide" the same; for a deer skin, 120 seawan; and smaller amounts for skins of foxes and other animals. An official placard complains that the settlers were too eager for trade, and "ran after" the Indians. They were warned not to coax them or give them gifts, but to let them bring in their furs and receive the pay appointed. In September, 1660, Beekman writes that the ship De Groene Arent (Green Eagle) took out 21 bear skins and 106 deer-skins. A year later he remarks upon the war between the Minquas and Senecas that it "makes the trade bad," and in a letter in February, 1662, he says the war continues, and that "the river savages here are also in great fear, so that they have not undertaken their usual hunting, which is the cause of a poor trade."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

A stylized, handwritten signature in dark ink, likely representing the name 'William Penn'. The script is fluid and cursive, with a prominent initial 'W' and 'P'.

Signature of William Penn, founder of Pennsylvania; born 1644; died 1718

Besides furs and skins, other exports were as yet few. Not enough grain was raised, as a rule, for home use, though in November, 1662, Beekman writes: "Next summer we shall most likely be compelled to get our bread-stuffs from the Manhattans, as at present all the grain is bought up by the merchants and sent there." In March, 1658, a vessel for Manhattan was loaded partly with hickory wood at Altona, and partly with rye straw at Tinicum. Later, we hear of a cargo of lumber—"clapboards"—loaded on Upland kill to go by the ship De Eyckenboom (The Oak Tree) to Holland.

In July, 1658, William Beekman, who had been a schepen (magistrate) at Manhattan since 1656, was appointed by Stuyvesant to represent the West India Company on the Delaware, as its commissary and Vice-Director. He was sent to Altona (Christina) to reside—though his duties in connection with the prevention of smuggling and the collection of customs took him much to New Amstel—and he remained at Altona throughout the Dutch period, his letters and reports forming the most valuable material extant for a study of the colony, especially that part within the Pennsylvania limits. Most of the Swedish settlers, being north of the Christina, on the company's land, came under his supervision, and his relations with them were friendly.

THE DUTCH SETTLEMENT

One of the earliest of Beekman's duties was to purchase from the Indians the land from Bombay Hook to the Delaware capes. It had been feared that the English "from Virginia" might seize the mouth of the river. The usual agreement was made with the complaisant natives, and in May, 1659, a log "fort" was built at the Hoorn-kill by Beekman and D'Hinoyossa—the latter the lieutenant of Alrich at New Amstel. A small company of soldiers was placed in the fort. It is worthy of note that this was the first reoccupancy of the place by white men since the destruction of Swanendael, in 1631.

No enemies from Virginia appeared, but in the summer and autumn of 1659 trouble threatened from Maryland.

The Maryland colony was now a quarter of a century old. Its charter had been granted by Charles the First of England, in April, 1632, to George Calvert, the first Lord Baltimore, but he dying, it was actually issued to his son, Cecil Calvert, the second Baron, on June 20 of that year. By its terms this grant was for lands uncultivated and unoccupied—hactenas inculta is the Latin phrase of the document—and the question was to recur afterward many times, as we shall see, whether the west shore of the Delaware was unoccupied by white men in the year 1632. Lord Baltimore sent out two ships, the Ark and the Dove, in the autumn of 1633, under the command of his brother, Leonard Calvert, whom he appointed Governor, and in March, 1634, they landed at St. Mary's, on the Potomac, and began the settlement.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

We should remind ourselves at this point of the great events which had occurred in England during the time we have been tracing the struggling life of the white men's colonies on the west side of the Delaware, from the day of DeVries and Swanendael down to the supremacy of the Dutch flag under Stuyvesant. The Civil War in England had endured from 1642 onward to the execution of King Charles in 1649. Cromwell had ruled England to his death in 1658, and now, in 1659, as the settlers at New Amstel began to be concerned about the Maryland government's designs, the "restoration" of Charles the Second was impending.

In the course of their petty troubles a particularly vexatious experience of both Dutch and Swedes on the Delaware had been the "desertion" not only of colonists, but of enlisted soldiers and "servants," to the Maryland settlements along the Chesapeake. In June, 1659, Governor Alrich and his Council at New Amstel decided to address a letter to the Maryland government, asking the rendition of six soldiers who had recently absconded in that direction. This letter they sent to Colonel Nathaniel Utie, an Englishman who occupied the island in Chesapeake Bay, opposite the mouth of Elk river, known as Spesutia. Utie had located there to trade with the Indians, and had been accorded a place in the Governor's Council in Maryland, and besides had been appointed captain in the military force of the province. The Dutch apparently recognized him as the most important of their Maryland neighbors.

The immediate outcome of the letter to Colonel Utie was not at all what Governor Alrich had designed. It stirred up the Maryland authorities to claim that the whole of the Delaware settlements were within the Maryland grant. The Calverts had long held this view, but an opportune moment to insist upon it had not before appeared. Colonel Utie now told the New Amstel messenger that Lord Baltimore had commanded that the lands within his boundaries "should be reviewed and surveyed, and when ascertained be reduced under his jurisdiction," and that he himself had a commission to go to New Amstel on this business.

THE DUTCH SETTLEMENT

The Governor of Maryland at this time was Josias Fendall, for whom even the historians of that colony and state have few words of praise. Fendall and his Council, at Anne Arundel, (Annapolis), on the 3d of August (1659), directed Colonel Utie to repair to "the pretended governor of a people seated in Delaware Bay, within his lordship's province," and "to require them to depart." He was to "insinuate" to them, however, if he found an opportunity, that if they would come to Maryland to settle they would find "good conditions" and "have protection in their lives, liberty and estates."

It resulted, therefore, that on the 6th of September, Colonel Utie and a party of five companions and attendants, with four of the Dutch deserters, came riding into New Amstel. Alrich was already nerve-shaken, and this cavalcade may well have alarmed him. Besides the droughts, the floods, the scarcity of food, the weakness of the fort, the slender force of soldiers, his wife had recently died. Though the veil of the future was not rent for him, his own death lay but a few weeks distant.

Colonel Utie presented the Maryland demands in a letter from Fendall. Beekman, summoned from Altona, joined with Utie in receiving them. The Dutch made the best reply they could to so imperious a summons: that they were not subject to the King of England, but to the States-General of the Netherlands; that their colony dated back many years, to a time before Lord Baltimore's grant had been heard of; and that they had no authority to surrender lands or make agreements, and must refer the whole subject to Stuyvesant, for which purpose a reasonable time, say three weeks, must be granted. Utie, according to the Dutch officials' report to Stuyvesant, was blustering and irritating; he told them their weakness was evident, and that it would suit him best to seize the place now, when the tobacco crop was mostly gathered. Finally, however, he agreed to grant the three weeks' time, and after a stay of five days he and his suite departed.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Stuyvesant, at Manhattan, received news of these doings with characteristic rage. He denounced Utie and his "frivolous, fabricated instructions;" he almost equally rated Alrich and Beekman and their advisers for their "not less frivolous answers and proceedings," permitting Utie "to sow his seditious and mutinous seed" at New Amstel "during four or five days." Such conduct showed, he said, "unquestionable proofs of want of prudence and courage." They had earnestly asked for help, so he sent some at once, sixty soldiers—though he could ill spare them—under command of the valiant Captain Martin Krygier, a burgomaster of New Amsterdam. Also he sent "the beloved, discreet and faithful" Cornelius Van Ruyven, his secretary, who with Krygier should make a commission to sift thoroughly the situation on the South river. Still further, he commissioned two others, Augustine Heermans, (or Herman) and Resolved Waldron to go forthwith on an embassy to Maryland. Herman was a well known figure later as the "lord" of Bohemia Manor, on the Chesapeake; Waldron was the "under schout" at New Amsterdam. Stuyvesant directed them to see the Maryland authorities, request the surrender of fugitives, maintain the validity of the Dutch claims on the Delaware, and demand reparation for the "frivolous demands and bloody threatening" of Utie.

It resulted that nothing further of importance came of the Maryland demonstrations. Utie did not return at the end of the three weeks, or at all. The five hundred men whom it was reported he would bring to subdue New Amstel and Altona never appeared before those places. Instead, however, Van Ruyven and Krygier, Stuyvesant's commissioners, did come, and instituted an inquiry into Alrich's management, the outcome of which was an acrimonious dispute between him and them, which had hardly subsided when Alrich died, at the end of December, 1659. Herman and Waldron proceeded at once to Maryland, and the journal of their trip, written by Herman, is an interesting and valuable document. They left New Amstel on the 30th of September, overland, with Indian guides, and a few soldiers. Reaching the heads of Elk river they procured a boat and paddled down that stream to Chesapeake bay, and carefully avoiding the neighborhood of Spesutia island—on which sounds of a “frolic” were heard—reached Kent island on the 3d of October. On the 4th they were at Severn river, and on the 6th they reached the Patuxent. On the 8th they met Philip Calvert, the provincial secretary, and after some delay a formal meeting was arranged, with Governor Fendall and his Council, “at Mr. Bateman’s, at Patuxent.” This was held at last on the 16th, and was the first of a series of conferences in which, naturally, the principal theme of discussion was the question of superior claim on the Delaware. There was plenty of good cheer, after the Maryland manner then and since, and in the intervals of eating and drinking the debates grew earnest. At one time the Maryland people said that Lord Baltimore’s right, being that of the English crown, rested upon the discoveries of Sir Walter Raleigh, whereupon the Dutch envoys said their rights came still earlier from explorers sent out by the King of Spain, to which the United Netherlands, by the treaty of peace with him, had succeeded.

THE DUTCH SETTLEMENT

On the 17th of October, Gov. Fendall exhibited the patent of King Charles to Lord Baltimore, and showed that it granted him land from Watkins Point, on Chesapeake bay, “northward unto the fortieth degree of latitude, and from the Atlantic ocean and Delaware bay on the east to the Potomac river on the west.” The envoys were, no doubt, quite prepared to learn this, for in a conversation earlier with Secretary Calvert he had told them that Maryland extended to the limits of New England, and being asked, “Where then, would New Netherland come in?” calmly answered he did not know!

Herman and Waldron, however, inspected the patent carefully, and were not long in fastening upon one of its weak points.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

In a memorandum which they drew up they pointed out the hactenus inculta clause, the recital that Baltimore had asked the King for land "not cultivated or planted, but only inhabited as yet by barbarous Indians," whereas, they said, their people had before 1632 been settled upon the South river. The Maryland claim, they said, went back but twenty-seven years, whereas the Dutch had been in possession for forty years—a statement which could hardly be justified unless the supposed voyage of Hendricksen in 1616, in the Orrust, could be established. That De Vries had planted his colony at Swanendael in the early part of 1631, a full year before Lord Baltimore's grant, there was no doubt, but it was equally beyond question—as the Swedes had insisted—that that settlement had been abandoned almost as soon as begun.

The result of the conferences, however, evidently was to impress the Maryland officials with a doubt of the complete validity of their claims upon the Delaware. Colonel Utie declared that he would like an opportunity to repeat his visit to New Amstel with a fresh commission, but Secretary Calvert and others of the Council were more conciliatory. What Fendall thought did not much matter, as he was nearing the end of his service as Governor. On the 20th of October Waldron departed for Manhattan, "with the reports, papers, and documents," while Herman proceeded to Virginia to try to make friends with the Governor there, in case of a possible future conflict with Maryland.

No disturbance, therefore, of the peace of New Amstel was caused by the Maryland government. Nor did any other enemy appear for five years. The colonists on the Delaware continued much as before. At the death of Alrich, Alexander d'Hino-yossa succeeded as Deputy-Governor, and though his abilities tended much more to distraction than order, and he pleased apparently no one but himself—certainly not Beekman, or Stuyvesant, as their letters and reports abundantly show—he held his place to the end of the Dutch rule in 1664. Few events in 1660-63 demand extended notice. D'Hinoyossa's arbitrary conduct, which Stuyvesant could not control because the City of Amsterdam owned the New Amstel colony, made no small part of Beekman's letters. Even worse was D'Hinoyossa's behavior to the Indians. The sale of liquor to them went on almost unchecked. Beekman's letters abound in details of this. In May, 1660, he quotes the testimony of several persons that for a long time no regard had been paid by the Governor "to the sale of strong drinks to the savages, so that they run about with it in the daytime, and discharge their guns near the houses," etc. A few weeks later, June 30, he writes to Stuyvesant:

THE DUTCH SETTLEMENT

"Sir, I cannot omit to inform your honor that I see many drunken savages daily, and I am told that they sit drinking publicly in some taverns. On the 14th inst., when I went with Capt. Jacop and Mons. Schreck to the house of Foppe Janssen (a tavern) to salute Mr. Rendel Revel, who had come overland from Virginia, while we were there several drunken savages came before the windows, so that it was a disgrace in presence of strangers. Likewise our soldiers and others have told me that the savages had an entire anker of anise-liquor on the strand near the church, and sat around it drinking. One Gerret, the smith, came also at the same time complaining; he lives in the back part of the town near the edge of the forest, and says that he is much annoyed by drunken savages every night."

One of the worst offenders in the liquor selling was an official at Altona, the "clerk and reader" for the Fort, Jan Juriaens Becker. Despite his semi-clerical character, he was a bold offender, and supplied both soldiers and Indians with brandy in the face of Beekman's protests. Finally he was brought to trial at Manhattan, and then accused others of the same thing. He declared, indeed, that it would be hard to find many persons on the South river who did not sell liquor to the Indians, "because without it it is hard to get provisions"—a statement which finds some support in a letter of Beekman himself, a little later, in which he says to Stuyvesant, "I need also two ankers of brandy or distilled water to barter it next month for maize for the garrison, as it is easier obtained for liquor than for other goods." Becker submitted the affidavits of three persons in his defense, who declared not only that liquor was "openly sold to the savages in the Colony and in and near Fort Altona," but that if the "poor inhabitants" did not sell or barter liquor to the Indians for "maize, meat, and other things, they would perish from hunger." And another affidavit submitted by Becker declared that Alrich had once sent the deponents "with several ankers of brandy and Spanish wine in a sloop to the savages, to trade them for Indian corn, or wampum or whatever they could best obtain."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Becker was convicted and fined, but upon his earnest pleading that the fine would ruin him, and that the liquor traffic "was carried on so openly by high and low officers of the state," that he thought it a venial matter for him occasionally to trade some brandy "for Indian corn and deer meat," the main penalty was remitted.

The Indians themselves were well aware of the ruin brought upon them by the "fire-water." Beekman writes in March, 1662, that at Tinneconck some of the "river" chiefs had "addressed themselves to Mr. Hendrick Huyghen," and had "proposed and requested that no more brandy or strong drink should be sold" to their people. They presented three belts of wampum to support the petition, and Beekman remarks that "the request was a proper one," agreeing with Stuyvesant's orders, and the placards posted about. D'Hinoyossa acted upon it by threatening a fine of 300 guilders on any trader caught selling liquor to the natives, and also authorizing the Indians themselves "to rob those who bring liquors."

The consequences of the liquor traffic, open or illicit, were quarrels and bloodshed. The drunken Indian, equally with the drunken white man, was capable of every mischief, and it was the pitiable experience of the little hamlets at New Amstel and Al-

CHARLES R.

Whereas his Majesty, in consideration of the great Merit and Faithful Services of Sir William Penn deceased, and for divers other good Causes him thereunto moving, hath been Graciously pleased by Letters Patents bearing Date the Fourth day of March last past, to Give and Grant unto William Penn Esquire, Son and Heir of the said Sir William Penn, all that Tract of Land in America, called by the Name of Pennsylvania, as the same is bounded on the East by Delaware River, from Twelve Miles distance Northwards of Newcastle Town, unto the Thir and fourtieth Degree of Northern Latitude, if the said River both extend so far Northwards, and if the said River shall not extend so far Northwards, then by the said River so far as it both extend: And from the head of the said River, the Eastern Bounds to be determined by a Meridian Line to be Drawn from the head of the said River, unto the said Thir and fourtieth Degree, the said Province to extend Westward five Degrees in Longitude, to be Computed from the said Eastern Bounds, and to be bounded on the North, by the Beginning of the Thir and fourtieth Degree of Northern Latitude, and on the South by a Circle Drawn at Twelve Miles distance from Newcastle Town, and Westwards unto the Beginning of the fourtieth Degree of Northern Latitude, and then by a straight Line Westwards to the limit of Longitude above mentioned, together with all Powers, Preeminences and Jurisdictions necessary for the Government of the said Province, as by the said Letters Patents Reference being thereunto had, both more at large appear.

His Majesty both therefore hereby Publish and Declare his Royal Will and Pleasure, That all Persons Settled or Inhabiting within the Limits of the said Province, do yield all Due Obedience to the said William Penn, his Heirs and Assigns, as absolute Proprietaries and Governours thereof, as also to the Deputy or Deputies, Agents or Lieutenants, Lawfully Commissioned by him or them, according to the Powers and Authorities Granted by the said Letters Patents: Whereby his Majesty Express and Requires a ready Compliance from all Persons Whom it may concern, as they tender his Majesties Displeasure.

Given at the Court at Whitehall the Second day of April 1681. In the Thir and thirtieth year of Our Reign.

To the Inhabitants and Planters of the Province of Pennsylvania.

By His Majesties Command,

CONWAY.

L O N D O N,

Printed by the Assigns of John Bill, Thomas Newcombe and Henry Hills, Printers to the Kings most Excellent Majesty. 1681.

Proclamation of the Charter to William Penn, April 2, 1681

THE DUTCH SETTLEMENT

tona during these years to see this fully exemplified. In November, 1659, Beekman writes that at Altona six Indians, inflamed with Becker's brandy, disturbed the place, were pursued by the soldiers "into the bushes," and came back later and stole two blankets and a gun. A few weeks after, "two soldiers being drunk"—again on Becker's liquor—"burned a little Indian canoe, whereupon the savages threatened to set fire to a house or kill some cattle," so that Beekman had to interfere and pacify them. But, worse still, an Indian who had been drinking in the woods with a white man, Pieter Mayer, was next morning found dead, "a little further into the woods," whereupon the other Indians threatened the man who had sold the liquor, saying he had put poison in it. Presently they set the dead body "upon a hurdle, and put it on four great prongs," opposite the house where the liquor was bought, as a "curse" to the place.

Worse followed. A week after the report of these occurrences, Beekman wrote that two Indians had been killed "by Christians," and their bodies found "in the underbrush or marshy places near New Amstel." Presently it appeared that three had been killed, instead of two; it "was done upon the farm of the late Mr. Alrich by his two servants." Stuyvesant, in a letter to Holland, calls it a "cruel murder," committed "only from the damnable desire of wampum," the victims being "a man, a woman and a boy." The murderers were known, and had been arrested, but D'Hinoyossa and his Council released them. The settlers were alarmed, fearing bloody reprisals by the Indians, and endeavors were hastily made to conciliate the neighboring chiefs. Beekman wrote to the Swedish sheriff Van Dyck to come to Altona to meet the Indians for that purpose, the Swedes being "better acquainted with the temper and manner of the savages than we new-comers," but Van Dyck excused himself, saying the Indians had told them not to "trouble themselves with the matter." An incident a little later (April, 1660) may be added here. Jan Barentsen, a carpenter, was killed by the Indians in the direction of Maryland, and his wife died, either at Colonel Utie's or at the house of "Jacob," an Indian trader in the Susquehanna region. A child of this unfortunate couple survived, and the romantic story attached to it that it had been born in Holland "at the departure of Mr. Alrich, in the ship Prins Mauritz," in 1657, and had been christened "Amstelhoop" (Hope of Amstel), "at the request of the Lords Burgomasters."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The revenge of blood for the three Indians killed near New Amstel came early in May, 1661, when four white men, three English and one Dutch, were killed by Indians on the road from

Signature of Thomas Lloyd; governor of Pennsylvania; born 1640; died 1694

New Amstel to the Maryland settlements. As the news spread, the neighboring Indians, expecting now to be attacked by the whites, hid "in great fear" for two weeks. Two of them, however, had brought to New Amstel some of the clothing of the slain victims, and offered it for sale. They were arrested, but after an examination released by D'Hinoyossa as "not the right savages." The crime aroused general excitement and alarm. The Maryland authorities upbraided D'Hinoyossa for his action, and reports quickly spread that the English of that province would come in force and inflict their own punishment on the Indians. The river Indians were terrified at the rumor, and many of them met at Passyunk to collect wampum for presents to the Minquas to induce them to intervene. "The Minquas," Beekman adds in repeating this, had "already offered presents in peltries to the Governor of Maryland for this matter, but he refused to accept them, and had on the contrary requested them to go and destroy the river savages, which they declined to do." A few weeks later, commissioners from Maryland appeared at New Amstel, and D'Hinoyossa summoned the river chiefs from Passyunk and other places to a conference to compose the troubles. Only one chief ventured to come, and he was from the east side of the river, not the west, but the meeting was held at Appoquinimy, on the border line of the Maryland country. Governor Calvert himself attended, "and made peace with the aforesaid sachem, and merry with D'Hinoyossa." This conclusion was pleasing, no doubt, to the absent "river chiefs," who had been saying to Andreas Hudde and others that "the English have killed some of ours, and we again some of theirs," and that one would "set off against the other."

THE DUTCH SETTLEMENT

A handwritten signature in cursive script that reads "Edward Shippen". The letters are fluid and connected, with a prominent 'E' and 'S'.

Signature of Edward Shippen; member Provincial Council, 1696-1712; judge of the Supreme Court, 1697; mayor of Philadelphia, 1701

Nor have these details quite exhausted the evil story. Early in September, 1662, Joris Floris, an old man, was driving through the forest, near New Amstel, with a wagon drawn by two horses, when he was "shot down from the horse" and scalped. Beekman wrote that he thought a river Indian had been previously shot by the whites, and that this was an act in reprisal; but further inquiry made the murder more mysterious. A few weeks later, in November, "about an hour after evening," a young man, a servant of Jan Staelcop, the miller near Altona, was killed "about four hundred steps from the Fort." The river Indians charged this on the Minquas or Senecas, and a fortnight after, five Minqua chiefs, with their suites, came to Beekman at Altona, alleging that the act had been committed by a captive Seneca belonging to them. They declared their own good will. "As long as any Christians have lived here," they said, "it never can be proved that any ill or violence has been done them by our nation," though three years before, they added, a Minqua Indian had been killed by the Christians at New Amstel. Often, they said, they had mediated for peace between the Christians and other Indians.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The war of the Iroquois tribes, at this period, upon the Indians of the Susquehanna, has been referred to in an earlier chapter. Beekman wrote at the end of May, 1661, that "the Minquas and the Sinnecus are at war with each other." Six weeks later he repeated this, and added a report that "the English from Maryland have assisted the Minquas with fifty men in their fort." In October he heard that the Minquas were hard pressed by the Senecas, and that the latter had killed twelve river Indians on the river "a little above the Swedish settlement," so that the Swedes now feared the Senecas would kill their cattle. In February, 1662, he reported the war on the Susquehanna continuing, and in December the Minqua chiefs visiting Altona said they were expecting the aid of eight hundred "black Minquas," of whom two hundred had already come. Next spring they would resume their war against the Senecas and assail them in their own stronghold—"visit their fort." In May following, 1663, however, the Senecas were first in the field. "Jacob," the Indian trader, sent word to Andreas Hudde that 1600 Senecas—an exaggerated figure, of course—with their wives and children, were marching on the Minquas, and were then but two days distant. Later Beekman repeats this story, but reports the Senecas as only eight hundred, and relates that the Minquas had made a sally from their fort, and had driven off their assailants, pursuing them for two days, killing ten and capturing others.

The lugubrious story of drunkenness, quarrels, murders, and wars made the dark side of the colony's life; there was, however, a better side. A cheerful feature was the confidence shown in the Indians by selecting them as guides and messengers. The letters of Alrich and Beekman, if sent overland, as was the rule, were given to an Indian to carry. He went in a boat to Meggeckessou, the falls of the Delaware at Trenton, and thence by land to Communipaw, opposite New Amsterdam. In many letters Beekman adds the memorandum that he is sending it "by a savage." "On the 9th instant, at night, I sent a savage to your honor." "Sir, this is in haste, as the savage is very urgent to leave with the tide." "Mr. Beekman" (writes Andreas Hudde) "has requested me to forward this, . . . therefore I have hired this savage thereto; he is to have at the Manahatas a cloth and a pair of socks." "Gentlemen, I have promised the bearer, . . . a piece of cloth and a pair of socks provided he brings over the letter in four or five days at the utmost." These are some of the many references to the subject. As the plan was consistently maintained it is evident that the Indians proved faithful carriers.

THE DUTCH SETTLEMENT

The name of an Indian runner, Sipaele, is given in one letter, but few other names of the local Indians are known. Becker, the brandy-selling clerk, says he gave a drink occasionally to friendly sachems such as "Meckeck Schinck, Wechnarent, Areweehing, and Hoppaming," but of none of these have we any other account than the dram-drinking except in the case of Hoppaming. Of him Beekman relates, in January, 1661, that "about fourteen days ago, the grave of one Hoppemink, an Indian chief, was robbed; he had been buried a short time before (in New Amstel). They took out of it a party of wampum, 3 or 4 pieces of duffel, and further what he had with him; the savages murmur about it, and may perhaps undertake something bad."

It had been a fixed plan of the Dutch officials to collect the Swedes into compact communities, where they could be more readily watched. But though numerous efforts were made, the time never came when this could be effected. The Swedes naturally did not desire to leave the homes they had made. Beekman went among them at different times to persuade them to remove, but he had himself little heart in the undertaking, and reported to Stuyvesant that the difficulties were great. In April, 1660, he writes that he has been with the Swedes and Finns "several days." There was a dispute among those at Kingsesse and

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Aroenemeck which should remove—in which neighborhood they should concentrate. “Nobody is willing to make room, . . . everyone asserts that he will keep his entire lot and fields.” At Tinicum Madam Papegoia declared she could not remove, “on account of her heavy buildings, also because the church stands there.” A sergeant, Andries Lourens, had tried to enlist some Swedes for the Esopus war against the Indians, but none would go; Beekman believed their head men had advised them “not to scatter themselves, but to keep about here”—which is very likely. For the time he decided that they should not be disturbed until they could gather their harvests, and in May Peter Kock and two other deputies came to represent that the proposed removal was impracticable, and to say that if they must break up, “then we shall go away to where we may remain living in peace.” Finally the Dutch officials appear to have abandoned the scheme.

Seal of David Lloyd

THE DUTCH SETTLEMENT

It is probable that the Swedes had in some cases a definite grant of land. In the recitals of old titles in Delaware there is occasionally a reference to a grant by Stuyvesant, though no original papers appear to be extant.

The division of the Dutch territory into separate jurisdictions and interests was obviously a grave disadvantage. In 1663, therefore, the City of Amsterdam acquired from the West India Company all its claims upon the South river. The matter was under negotiation throughout the year; at the end of December Stuyvesant executed a formal act ceding to D'Hinoyossa, as the representative of the burghers of Amsterdam, "the South River from the sea upwards, so far as that river extends itself—toward the country, on the East side three miles from the border of the river, and toward the West side so far as the country extends until it reaches the English colonies."

D'Hinoyossa, who had been to Holland, and had explained to the burghers of Amsterdam the great possibilities of trade and population on the Delaware, came back as the ruler of the whole river, triumphing thus over Beekman, whose office was now ended, and over Stuyvesant, whose authority he had defied. He reached New Amstel December 3, 1663, in the ship de Purmerlander Kerck (the Church of Purmerland), with Peter Alrich and Israel Helm "as members of the High Council," and about one hundred and fifty immigrants. He proceeded at once to organize his colony, and his policy appeared more favorable to the Swedes than Stuyvesant's had been. Peter Cock was appointed collector of tolls on imports and exports, and Israel Helm to supervise the fur trade "at the upper end of Passyunk."

All this, however, was in vain. It recalls the energy of Risingh just before Stuyvesant swooped down upon him in 1655. The English lion was now ready to devour New Netherland. The summer of 1664 brought the catastrophe, when the fleet of the Duke of York appeared at Manhattan. In September Stuyvesant surrendered there, and in October the colony of D'Hinoyossa was captured. We shall speak of these events in more detail, in the chapter following.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The number of white people on the west bank of the Delaware river, at the close of the year 1664 can only be conjectured. There were, no doubt, fully a thousand, and possibly there were twice that number. D'Hinoyossa represented at Amsterdam, in 1663, that there were people on "one hundred and ten plantations," besides those living in the towns, soldiers, etc. In 1659 it had been proposed to tax the Swedes "five or six guilders for each family," and Beekman estimated that this would produce about four hundred guilders, thus indicating that there were not over eighty Swedish families. In March, 1660, he reported that Sheriff Van Dyck said "the Swedes and Finns count about 130 men capable to bear arms," which would indicate a total Swedish and Finnish population of at least six hundred.

The colonists were located on or near the river. A handful of soldiers probably remained at the Delaware capes, and there was also there a little colony of communistic "Mennonites" whom Peter Cornelius Plockhoy had brought over from Holland a few months earlier. Northward from the capes to Bombay Hook, and thence to New Amstel, there was hardly a white man's home. New Amstel itself was the most important place on the river—though D'Hinoyossa proposed now to locate the colonial capital at Appoquinimy (now Appoquinimink), southeast from New Amstel, as a better point from which to trade with Maryland. Altona, besides its decayed "fort," had a few houses. Then, northward, the clearings and plantings of the Swedes extended to where Philadelphia now stands, most of them being north of the Pennsylvania line. There were some centers of activity and life; Marcus Hook, Upland, Tinicum (occasionally called New Leyden), Passyunk, Kingsessing and Karakung (the old Swedes Mill), were places known to all, white and red, who had acquaintance with the South River colony.

CHAPTER V

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK.—1664-1681

THE Dutch had had many warnings of the English purpose. From the side of New England encroachments had been coming on Long Island, and on the mainland, almost within sight of Manhattan. From the side of Maryland, as we have seen, claims were made which would have obliterated New Netherland. The closing years of Stuyvesant's rule were times of distress and distraction over the increasingly difficult task of maintaining his ground.

The fatal weakness of his situation lay in the nature of the colony itself. It had never really taken root. It was essentially a trading, not a planting, enterprise which the West India Company had undertaken, and as a competent American writer has observed, "the trading spirit is not of itself sufficient to establish successful settlement, and monopolies cannot be safely intrusted with the government of colonies."

It had been the traditional policy of England to claim the whole North American coast covered by the two blanket charters which James the First had granted to the London and the Plymouth companies in 1606—stretching from Carolina to Nova Scotia, including islands within a hundred miles of the coast, and reaching inland without limit. When in 1632 Charles the First told the Dutch ambassadors, as has been related, that the settlements called New Netherland were all on English ground, it was but a re-statement of the settled policy, and a warning of what should be expected at a time convenient to England. And this time, after the passage of the Navigation Act by the English Parliament, in 1660, and its amendment in 1663, had now come.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

For the Navigation Act was an instrument to build up England's commerce, and destroy that of Holland. It provided that no European goods should go into an English colony except they came from England in an English ship. Furthermore, no goods produced in the colonies which the English merchants cared for—and they were strictly enumerated in the law, and the list increased from time to time—could be sent to any other ports than those under the English crown, though goods not desired in England might be sent from the colonies to ports south of Cape Finisterre on the coast of Spain, thus cutting out the coast of France.

The establishment of this system was the beginning of the chapter which first consolidated England's power in North America, and in the end lost to her all she seemed to have gained. The Navigation Acts, and the consequent monopoly of colonial trade in the hands of English merchants, was an intolerable injustice which in a large degree caused the Revolution of 1776.

But the American Revolution was in 1663 a full century distant. The pressing question in England was the expansion of trade, the abasement of Holland, increase of the Crown revenues, and consequent profit to those who had the job of collecting them. It was perceived that the intended monopoly in trade in America could not be effective on the long coast line while the great port at Manhattan remained in the hands of the Dutch, and while they held the traffic of the North and South rivers. Some illicit trade there would always be, but the amount of it, with this great gap open in the English line, must be unbearable.

The policy of England therefore concurred with the personal inclination of the King and his brother, when on the 12th of March, 1663-4,¹ Charles granted to James, Duke of York, a pat-¹We have come now to the English calendar usage and its "double dating" between January 1 and March 24. The Dutch would have made this date March 22, 1664, for they had adopted the Gregorian calendar in 1582, but England retained the Julian calendar until 1752.

Old Penn Mansion, Letitia Court

Built 1682; removed and re-erected in Fairmount Park in 1892

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

ent for a great body of land in America, lying between the west bank of the Connecticut river, and the east side of the Delaware, the inland line being drawn from "the head of the Connecticut river to the source of Hudson river, thence to the head of the Mohawk branch of the Hudson, and thence to the east side of Delaware bay." This was New Netherland, the colony which the Dutch had been promoting almost since the voyage of Hudson, but Charles assumed that it was English territory, and that the Dutch for half a century had simply been intruders upon it.

Such a claim, if pressed, meant of course war with the Dutch Republic. For that the English King and his brother were ready, if not prepared. Though their sister had married one of the chief of the Dutchmen, William, Prince of Orange, and the son of this marriage, William, now a lad of fourteen, was their nephew, neither King nor Duke loved Holland.¹

The Duke of York was the Lord High Admiral of England. Ships to seize the Dutch territory were thus at his command, and four of these were at once fitted out for America. Four commissioners went on board, to take charge of the new territory when it should be seized—Col. Richard Nicolls, Sir Robert Carr, Col. George Cartwright, and Samuel Maverick. The last-named had been some time in the Massachusetts colony, an implacable opponent of the ruling people there; the other three were officers in the British army. Nicolls was the brains of the commission, an able and sagacious man.

James, Duke of York, with whom we must now concern ourselves more or less for a quarter of a century of this narrative, was in 1664 thirty-one years old. He had married in 1660 Anne ¹As this narrative of Pennsylvania will presently have to do with this nephew of Charles and James, William of Orange, who became the son-in-law of James in 1677, and King of England in 1688 (William III.), a few facts of interest may be mentioned here. William's father died in 1650, of small-pox, eight days before his

(the son's) birth, and his mother (Mary, daughter of Charles I., and sister of Charles II., and James II.), going to London, in 1660, at the Restoration, died there, of small-pox, so that William was left an orphan at ten years. He succeeded his uncle and father-in-law, as King of England, in 1688.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Hyde, daughter of that distinguished, if not altogether honored figure in English history, the Earl of Clarendon. As his brother the King had no legitimate children—though many others—James was heir presumptive to the English throne. The grant of the American territory to him would therefore, if he became king, merge in the Crown possessions, and the settlements upon it become a Crown colony.

Sailing from Portsmouth England, on the 15th of May (1664), the Duke's ships were at Boston late in July, and on the 19th of August had reached the waters around Manhattan Island.

A handwritten signature in cursive script, reading 'Thowynne'.

Signature of Thomas Wynne, member of the Assembly, 1683

The four were the Guinea, the Elias, the Martin, and the William and Nicholas, carrying altogether eighty-two guns. They had on board about four hundred and fifty soldiers. It was a force so overwhelming that resistance by Stuyvesant was manifestly impracticable. He would, however, have made a defense, if his councillors had not overborne him. They preferred to yield and accept the assurances of Col. Nicolls, rather than resist and be worse used. On the 29th of August the fort of New Amsterdam was surrendered by Stuyvesant, and the English flag was raised over it.

The South river colony was promptly visited, also. It did not lie—that part of it which had importance—within the King's grant to the Duke, for it was on the west side of the Delaware, but it was part of New Netherland. Sir Robert Carr was therefore sent, September 3, with the Guinea and the William and Nicholas, and as many soldiers as could be spared from the Manhattan fort, to "reduce" it to submission. The other three commissioners gave him a letter of authority. It began: "Whereas, we are informed that the Dutch have seated themselves at Delaware Bay, on his Majesty of Great Britain's territories, without his knowledge or consent, and that they have fortified themselves there, and drawn a great deal of trade thither; and being assured that if they be permitted to go on, the gaining of this place will be of small advantage to His Majesty, we"—etc., etc.

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

Caleb Pusey House, near Chester

Oldest building in Pennsylvania, having been built in 1683. Occupied by William Penn during occasional visits. Photo by Louise D. Woodbridge.

Once more, then, a hostile fleet came inside the capes and up the bay. The voyage from New York—as henceforth we shall know it—had been tedious, and it was not until the last day of September that the two warships reached New Amstel, and Carr summoned the place to surrender. He had, he says, “almost three days’ parley” with the Governor and the burghers; the latter agreed to yield, but the Governor and soldiers refused. He therefore landed his men, and the ships fired two broadsides upon the fort, after which it was stormed. The assailants sustained no loss, but the Dutch had ten wounded and three killed. This is Carr’s account, and all we have. If we may trust it, D’Hinoyossa appears as a more resolute defender of the post he held than his

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Dutch predecessor in 1654, or the Swedish in the following year.

Whether or not the capture was attended with bloodshed, Carr's men, according to his own report, plundered right and left. In the fort and the town soldiers and sailors vied with one another in robbery. Carr said they made so much "noise and confusion" about it that his commands could not be heard. The cows, oxen, horses, and sheep of the settlers were seized. More important than the quadrupeds were a number of negro slaves, who also fell prize to the Englishmen. There were some sixty or seventy of these. They had reached Manhattan in the Gideon, a slave ship, with over two hundred more, just before the arrival of the English fleet, and had barely escaped capture there, Peter Alrich having hurried them across the North river, and thence overland to New Amstel. They were now divided among the captors, and Carr promptly traded some to Maryland. In his report, a few days after the capture, he says: "I have already sent into Maryland some Neegars which did belong to ye late Governor at his plantation above, for beefe, pork, corne, and salt, and for some other small conveniences which this place affordeth not."

Sir Robert Carr assumed also the right to seize and distribute the lands of the Dutch officials—for which Col. Nicolls, in a letter from New York to London, censured him, though it does not appear that the disposition thus made was ultimately disturbed. The land of D'Hinoyossa Carr appropriated for himself; to his brother, Captain John Carr, he gave that of Van Sweringen, the Dutch "schout;" Ensign Stock, besides eleven of the negro slaves, got "Peter Alrich's land," and to the two captains of the ships which had brought the expedition, Hyde and Morley, there was generously granted a "manor," located far up the Delaware, a gift which for a long time to come would not be likely to much enrich a white owner.

Even the little community which Cornelius Plockhoy had begun so hopefully the year before, at the Hoorn kill, could not be spared by the plunderers. A vessel was sent down from New Amstel to seize it, and the poor colonists were stripped of all they had, "to a very naile," thus ending the enterprise.¹

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

Carr's report to Nicolls, from which a citation has already been made, was dated October 13, nearly a fortnight after the capture of New Amstel. He explained that it had been delayed by the disturbed condition of the Indians east of the Delaware, and further added: "We beg your endeavour to assist us in ye reconciliation of ye Indians called Synekees at ye Fort Ferrania and ye Huskchanoes [evidently Susquehannas] here, they coming and doing violence both to heathen and Christian, and leave these Indians to be blamed for it, insomuch that within less than six weeks several murders have been committed and done by their people upon the Dutch and Swedes here." The war of the Iroquois tribes with the Susquehannocks was still going on.

Colonel Nicolls came soon after to the Delaware, to inspect conditions there. Sir Robert Carr stayed on the river until February following, and then left finally, but his brother, Captain John Carr, remained, and was for several years in command at New Castle. The authority of Colonel Nicolls was exercised over the whole of what had been New Netherland. His residence, like that of the Dutch governors, was at New York. Conditions on the Delaware underwent little change. The Dutch had submitted of necessity, the Swedes no doubt very cheerfully; it was hardly in human nature for them to mourn the discomfiture of those who had in 1655 upset them so rudely. The policy of Nicolls was conciliatory and liberal. At Manhattan the Dutch, even including Stuyvesant, took the oath of allegiance to the English King, and D'Hinoyossa, who had retired to Maryland after the loss of his fort and government, wrote from St. Mary's a few weeks later, offering to do the same if he might have his New Amstel property restored. This, however, was not done; D'Hinoyossa remained in Maryland several years, having settled ¹For the story of Ploekhoy and his unfortunate colony, see Judge Pennypacker's "Germantown" (1899).

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

on Foster's island in Chesapeake Bay, now a part of Talbot county. In 1671 he petitioned the Maryland Assembly for naturalization for himself, wife and seven children. Later, he returned to Holland, and is said to have died there.

The governorship of Colonel Nicolls continued until mid-summer of 1668. He had found his post a hard one. At the end of July, 1665, he wrote to the Secretary of State at London lamenting the low state of his affairs. There had been, then, though nearly a year was gone, "no ship or the least supplies since the surrender." The soldiers and planters were in want. On the Delaware conditions were distressing; "all the planters on the river goe naked if not supplied." Later he wrote that he had wholly exhausted his own means, in providing for the general service. Finally, after the conclusion of peace between England and Holland by the treaty of Breda (July, 1667), he was given permission to return to England, and was replaced in August, 1668, by Colonel Francis Lovelace. Colonel Nicolls is praised by all historical writers for his honest and fair administration; it may, therefore, be something to the credit of the Duke of York that he should have selected for his first governor in America so good a man. When he quitted New York Nicolls was escorted to the ship by "the largest procession of military and citizens" that had ever been seen there. On his return to England he was made a knight, and resumed his position in the Duke of York's household. In 1672, when again England and Holland were at war, Nicolls was killed May 29, in the terrific naval battle with DeRuyter, at Solebay, falling, it is said, "at the feet" of the Duke of York. In the parish church at Amptill, Bedfordshire, the place of his birth, is a white marble monument to him, enclosing the cannon-ball that killed him.

Signature of Tamanen, June 23, 1683

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

Reviewing briefly those events of Governor Nicolls's three years which affect the Delaware colonists, the total is meagre. One of his first acts had been to establish a code of laws. These, called "the Duke's Laws," were applied first to the New York Colony, but ultimately to that on the Delaware, also, and were in force there when William Penn took possession, in 1681. They had been selected from the codes of the other English colonies by the Governor and his Council, and submitted for approval to a convention of delegates from the New York "towns," held at Hempstead, on Long Island, March 1, 1664-5. On the whole, "the Duke's Laws" were fairly adapted to the place and people. They provided for freedom of religion, trial by jury, and equal taxation, though they recognized slavery, and established a general liability to military service. They were enforced on the Delaware, when they became operative there, by three "Courts," composed of justices commissioned by the Governor. These courts sat at New Castle, at the Horekill (as it now came to be called, a corruption of Hoorn Kill), and at Upland—later also at St. Jones, now in Kent county, Delaware. The Duke's Laws came slowly into use on the Delaware. In 1668 Governor Nicolls directed that the book be "shewed and frequently communicated" to the Councillors at New Castle, so as to be enforced "in convenient time." Gov. Lovelace ordered in 1672 that "ye English lawes bee established both in ye towne and all plantations upon Delaware river." Finally, in 1676 (Sept. 22), Gov. Andros issued an imperative order to put them in force.

A handwritten signature in dark ink, appearing to read 'More', with a stylized flourish at the end.

Signature of Nicholas More, speaker of the Assembly, 1684

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

After the first flurry of the change of rule there was little discrimination by the English against the old settlers. Peter Alrich, who had lost his property at the surrender, was licensed by Gov. Nicolls in November, 1665, to trade at the Horekill, "with the Indians or any others," and received a permit at the same time to go from New York to the Delaware, "with his servant and six horses." In February, 1667-8, Governor Nicolls further favored him by the grant of two islands in the Delaware, below the present town of Bristol—long since, by drainage, united with the fast land of the Pennsylvania shore. In May, 1668, Captain John Carr, commanding at the New Castle fort, was directed by Governor Nicolls to call in, "in civil matters, so often as complaint is made," the schout (sheriff) and five others, as a Council, these five being three Swedes, Israel Helm, Peter Rambo, and Peter Cock, and two Dutchmen, Hans Block and Peter Alrich. There were, in fact, so few Englishmen on the river that it was necessary to employ, even in places of trust, the Dutch and Swedes. A letter in March, 1670-71, to Governor Lovelace, alludes to the difficulties of "us few English, and none of us able to speake to the Indians."

Nothing of internal trouble had occurred in the colony until 1669, when in the summer one of the Finnish Swedes, probably living about Marcus Hook, where several Finns had located, stirred up a revolt, or attempted to do so. He gave himself out to be a son of Konigsmark, the Swedish general, who twenty years earlier had been renowned in the Thirty Years' War in Germany, but he was commonly known as "the Long Finn." Exactly what he designed or hoped to do is not very clear; the charge in substance was that of stirring up sedition. Gov. Lovelace wrote that he was informed that he "goes up and down from one place to another, frequently raising speeches very seditious and false, tending to ye disturbance of his Majesty's peace and ye lawes of ye Government." Another settler named Henry Coleman, "one of ye Finns," was charged with complicity, and it was said that he had abandoned "his habitation, Cattle and Corne, without any care taken of them, to run after ye other person." Coleman was "well verst in ye Indian language," and he and the Long Finn were reported to be much among the Indians—this fact doubtless increasing the apprehensions of the settlers.

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

The fraudulent Konigsmark was soon arrested and imprisoned at New Castle. He attempted to escape, but was recaptured. Gov. Lovelace wrote to keep him "in hold and in irons" until he could be tried. There was some delay; the Governor proposed to come and hold the court, but was detained at New York. He wrote to Captain Carr and the Council to deal sharply with all involved in the threatened disturbance; "those of ye first magnitude" might be imprisoned or held to bail, and "for ye rest of ye poor deluded sort," he said, "I think the advice of their owne Countrymen is not to be despised, who knowing their temper well prescribe a method for keeping them in order, which is severity and laying such taxes on them as may not give them liberty to Entertain any other thoughts but how to discharge them."

Gov. Lovelace censured Madam Papegoia for an alleged sympathy with the movement; it was, he thought, ungrateful after the favors that had been shown her; he perceived, also, he said, that "ye little dominie"—Carolus Lock, the Swedish minister—had "played ye Trumpeter to the discord." There is no account of any proceedings against Madam Papegoia, but the minister was subsequently fined 600 guilders.

As to the Long Finn, he was finally tried by a jury at New Castle before commissioners named by the Governor, and—of course—found guilty. He was sentenced to death, but the Governor and Council at New York modified the sentence, ordering that he "be publicly and severely whipt, and stigmatized or branded in the face with the letter R"—for rebellion—and then sold "to the Barbadoes or some other of those remoter plantations." All of which was strictly carried out; the Finn was taken to New York in December, 1669, and confined there in the state-house until January 26, 1669-70, when he was placed on board a vessel, the Fort Albany, and sent to Barbados to be sold.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

As for those charged with complicity, fines more or less heavy, ranging from fifty guilders to two thousand, were imposed upon them. Coleman was fined 930 guilders, and appears later to have been in good standing in the colony.

The service of Lovelace extended to August, 1672—ending then with the advent of hostile Dutch ships. In his five years the Delaware colony slowly extended up the river. Some grants of land were made north of the Pennsylvania line—one of these to Richard Gorsuch in 1670-71 for a large tract on Pennypack and Poquessing creeks, which in 1672 came into the possession of Lovelace himself. The east bank of the river, from "the Falls" down, became well known at every point, for messengers and others passing overland between New York and New Castle often, perhaps usually, took this route. Gov. Lovelace passed by this path, in some state, with a party of soldiers, in March, 1671-2, and in the autumn of that year also, a more famous man, George Fox, the Friend or Quaker preacher.

In Fox's journal we get some descriptions that are of interest. He and his companions had ridden through the New Jersey woods from Shrewsbury. The journal says:

"We went to Middletown Harbour . . . in order to take our long journey . . . through the woods toward Maryland; having hired Indians for our guides. I determined to pass through the woods on the other side of Delaware Bay, that we might head the creeks and rivers as much as possible. On the 9th of the 7th month [November] we set forward, and passed through many Indian towns, and over some rivers and bogs; and when we had rode about forty miles, we made a fire at night, and lay by it. . . . Next day we travelled fifty miles, as we computed; and at night, finding an old house which the Indians had

M I S S I V E
V A N
W I L L I A M P E N N, Eygenaar en Gouverneur van PENNSYLVANIA,
In A M E R I C A.

Geschreven aan de Commissarissen van de Vrye Sociteyt der Handelaars, op de selve Provincie, binnen London resideerende.

B E H E L S E N D E:

Een generale beschrijvinge van de voornoemde Probitie: te weten / van hare Grond / Tuicht / Water / Bosscouten en Product, soo ynt de natuur als dooz het bouwen / neffens de groote vermeerderinge of meernighbuldinge / welke het Land aldaar opgebeve is.

Als mede: van de Naturellen of Inboozlingen des Landts / haer Taal /
Gewoonten en Manieren / haer Spijsen / Kupsen of Wigmans / Wilscheit / gemakkelijke manier van leven / Medicijnen / manieren van Begraaffenis / Godsdienst / Offerhanden en Gesangen / haer Hooge-sessen / Aegteringe / en ordze in hare Steden / waarmede sy met pmande handelen ober het verhoopen van Landerten / &c. Medens hare Justit-tie / of Recht doen ober quaatdoerders.

Witsgaders een Bericht van de eerste Coloniers de Hellanders / &c. En van de tegenwoordige toestand en welgesteltheit van de voornoemde Pro-bitie en Rechtbanken / &c. aldaar.

Waar by noch gevoeght is een Beschrijving van de Hoofst-Stadt.

P H I L A D E L P H I A.

Nu onlangs uytgeset, en gelegen tusschen twee Navigable Rivieren, namentlijk: tusschen Delaware en Schuylkil.

Ende een verhaal van de voorspoedige en voorsderlige standt van saken bant de voornoemde Societeit binnen de voornoemde Stadt en Probitie / &c.

A M S T E R D A M,

Gedruckt voor J A C O B C L A U S, Boekverkooper in de Prince-straat, 1684.

Title page of Dutch Book to influence immigration to Pennsylvania

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

forced the people to leave, we made a fire and stayed there, at the head of Delaware Bay."

The place thus reached was Jegou's (afterward called Chygoe's) Island, a part practically of the New Jersey shore. Here Peter Jegou, a Frenchman, had acquired a right, and had built a log house as a "house of entertainment for ye accommodation of Travelers." It is the site of the present town of Burlington. Governor Lovelace, arranging for his trip of the previous March, had given instruction to Captain Garland: "Go as speedily as you can to Navesink, thence to the house of Mr. Jegoe, right against Mattiniconck island, on Delaware river, where there are some persons ready to receive you." Previous to George Fox's journey it seems that the Indians had driven Jegou away. The journal proceeds:

"Next day we swam our horses over a river, about a mile, at twice, first to an island called Upper Dinidock, and then to the mainland; having hired Indians to help us over in their canoes."

"Upper Dinidock" is, of course, Mattiniconck, mentioned by Lovelace. It is the large island opposite Burlington, usually called Burlington island. This had apparently been in possession of Governor D'Hinoyossa, at the Dutch surrender in 1664, and had been seized by Sir Robert Carr. Later, 1668. Governor Lovelace seems to have given it in occupancy, if not ownership, to Peter Alrich. It was an important place, at the crossing of the river, and as a post for the Indian trade up the Delaware. Here, in September, 1671, two white men, servants of Alrich, were killed by Indians. The guilty parties were known, and one of them, Tashiwycan, explained that his sister had died, causing him great sorrow. The act, he believed, was caused by a "manitou," and in redress he had set out to kill the Christians.

Alrich reported the deed to Governor Lovelace and the Council, at New York. The Indians, he said, disowned and condemned the act, and proposed to punish the murderers. They had suggested a plan for this: that the two be gotten to a "kintecoy"—cantic: frolic—and that "in the midst of the mirth" one hired for the purpose should "knock them i' the head."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

A general attack upon the band, and perhaps on all the neighboring Indians, was proposed, but fortunately not undertaken. Peter Alrich gave his counsel. The "propper time," he told the Governor, to attack the Indians, "is within a month from this time"—the end of September—"for after that they'll break off their keeping together in a towne and goe a hunting, [and] soe bee separated."

Lovelace wrote an urgent letter to William Tomm on the subject, expressing the view that "ye vengeance of God will never forsake us till we avenge ye Blood of ye Innocent on ye contrivers' heads." He directed the magistrates to "sell no powder, shott, or Strong waters to the Indians, on paine of death," but keep a fair face toward them, as if no ill feeling existed, waiting a convenient time for the punitive expedition. The magistrates, however, in a meeting at Peter Cock's, earnestly advised a moderate policy. "Wee thinke," they wrote, "that at this time of the yeare itt is too late to begin a warr against the Indyans, the hay for our beasts not being brought to any place of safety, and so for want of hay wee must see them starve before our faces: the next yeare wee can cutt itt more convenient. Wee intend to make Towns at Passyunk, Tinnaconck, Upland, and Verdrieties Hoocke, whereto the out-plantations must retire. Your honor's advice for a frontier about Matinnicunck island is very good, and likewise another at Wicaquake, for the defense whereof your honor must send men. . . . If possible there [should] be hired fifty or sixty north Indyans, who will doe more than 200 white men in such a warr."

With these views the Council at New York concurred. The season—November—being "not a good time" for war, they decided not to begin one. The settlers were urged to organize, and each to provide himself with a pound of powder and two pounds of bullets. The island, Mattiniconck, was ordered to be fortified—which almost certainly was not done.

James II

Duke of York; King of England 1685-1689

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

The Indians themselves disposed of the case. A meeting with the chiefs was held at Peter Rambo's, and they undertook to bring in, "dead or alive," the two criminals. "Accordingly," says Samuel Smith, "two Indians sent by the sachems to take them, coming to Tashiwycan's wigwam in the night; one of them his particular friend; him he asked if he intended to kill him; he answered 'no, but the sachems have ordered you to die.' He demanded what his brothers—the other Indians of the band—said; being told they also said he must die, he then, holding his hands before his eyes, said 'kill me!' Upon this, the other Indian, not his intimate, shot him in the breast. They took his body to Wickaco [Philadelphia], and afterwards hung it in chains at New Castle. The English gave the sachems for this five matchcoats. The other murderer, hearing the shot, ran naked into the woods, and what came of him after appears not."

The journal of George Fox gives no sign of these or any Indian troubles. After his crossing the river at Matinniconck, quoted above, he proceeds:

"This day [November 11, 1672] we could reach but about thirty miles, and came at night to a Swede's house, where we got a little straw, and stayed that night. Next day, having hired another guide, we traveled about forty miles through the woods, and made a fire at night, by which we lay and dried ourselves. . . The next day we passed over a desperate river, which had in it many rocks and broad stones, very hazardous to us and our horses. Then we came to Christiana river, where we swam our horses, and went over ourselves in canoes. . . Thence we went to Newcastle, . . and being very weary and inquiring in the town where we could buy some corn for our horses, the governor came and invited me to his house, and afterwards desired me to lodge there, saying he had a bed for me and I should be welcome."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Trade on the Delaware, in Lovelace's time, continued much as before. In June, 1671, Captain Carr requested the Governor and his Council to order that no ship be allowed to trade above New Castle, as it would ruin the town's trade, "those that goe up receiving ready payment in peltry or corn for their liquors, which they sell by retaile with ye small measure, or for their petty wares." This request was granted, but a year and a half later the restriction was removed, complaints having been made that some vessels had been allowed to go up, while others were refused, and the example of the Hudson, open to Albany, being cited. At the same time, June, 1671, it was asked that "ye distilling of Strong Liquor out of Corne, being ye cause of a great consumption of that Graine, as also of ye debauchery and idleness of ye Inhabitants, from whence inevitably must follow their Poverty and Ruine, bee absolutely prohibited or restrayned"—to which the answer was made that a license should be required to distill, and a tax be laid of one guilder per can, the proceeds to go to the building of "ye new block house, or fort, or some other publique building."

A handwritten signature in dark ink, reading "Wm Markham". The "W" is large and stylized, with a long horizontal stroke extending to the right. The "Markham" is written in a cursive script.

Signature of William Markham, deputy-governor, 1681-1682

At intervals the Maryland Government made demonstrations to maintain their claims within the Delaware colony. The Horekill settlement especially drew forth these pressing attentions. In April, 1672, a surveyor came over and ostentatiously surveyed some lands there, threatening the people that if they did not acknowledge the authority of Lord Baltimore they would be "sent for into Maryland, there to be punished." In the summer of 1672 a more warlike demonstration was made. "One Jones," a Maryland man, rode into the Horekill town at the head of thirty men, and finding no opposition, "bound ye magistrates, and in-

George Fox

Founder of the Society of Friends; born 1624; died 1691

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

habitants, despitefully treated them, rifled and plundered them of their goods," and when it was demanded "by what authority" were these proceedings, answered with "a cock't pistol" to the breast of the imprudent questioner. Jones, Captain Cantwell wrote to Lovelace, seized "all Indian goods or skins" he could find, and an order was given "to drive a 20-penny nail in ye touch-hole of ye greate gun, & sees all ye guns and mill-stones."

Lovelace, of course, protested warmly to Governor Philip Calvert at such an outrage, and sent Captain Edmund Cantwell to St. Mary's with the letter. To the Duke of York he reported as well.

In the letter to Calvert, Lovelace added a reproach that deeds so unneighborly should be done "in these portending, boisterous times." He meant by these words the war that had begun in Europe. Then, and for many a long year, as we shall see, the people who were striving to build homes in the New World hung dependent on the politics of the Old. A quarrel there involved them here; whether it was to be peace or war for them they learned by ships which came slowly from Europe. In 1670 Charles II. abruptly changed the policy of England. He had helped to make, a little while before (1668), the Protestant Triple Alliance of England, Holland, and Sweden, to resist Louis XIV. of France, the Catholic king; but by the secret treaty of Dover (1670), he joined Louis to crush Holland, and check, if not root up, the Protestant growth.

The consequent war with Holland began in March, 1672. In August of that year Governor Lovelace wrote to Captain Cantwell to proclaim the King's declaration of war there and at Horekill. It was a terrifying time at the Capes, for the Maryland horsemen under Jones had just made their raid, and a "privateer," or more than one, probably flying the Dutch flag, had visited and plundered the place a few months before.

The blow from Europe fell suddenly at New York, and Lovelace was taken by surprise. He was in Connecticut, on a visit to Governor Winthrop, when, in August, 1673, a Dutch fleet appeared before the city. It was of overwhelming strength—twenty-three ships, counting prizes, and sixteen hundred men. Effective resistance, as in 1664, was impossible. The fort capitulated, New York became a Dutch city, and Lovelace returned to find himself deposed from office and ruined in estate. The two commanders of the Dutch ships, Cornelius Everts, "the Younger," and Jacob Binckes, settled affairs anew, appointed Captain Anthony Colve Governor, and sprinkled a fresh set of Dutch names liberally on town and country.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

A handwritten signature in cursive script, reading "Arthur Cooke". The signature is written in dark ink on a light background.

Signature of Arthur Cooke, speaker of the Assembly, 1689

The Delaware colony made no resistance; the English were too few, the Dutch too pleased, the Swedes too indifferent. The magistrates repaired early in September to New Orange—recently New York—and in Fort William Hendrick—recently Fort James—"made their submission." Peter Alrich was appointed schout and commander on South river, and by a series of orders everybody and everything was confirmed as it had been, the Up-land Court being continued, with jurisdiction from Christina "upwards unto the head of the river."

This episode of the restoration of Dutch rule lasted a little more than a year. By the treaty of Westminster, February 9, 1673-4, Holland restored New Netherland to England, and early in July (1674), proclamation of the treaty was made at the City Hall in New York. The news came over to the Delaware soon, and once more the colonists made the change of allegiance. Many of them had been once under the crown of Sweden, twice under the Netherland High Mightinesses—not to speak of the burgo-masters of Amsterdam—and now twice under his Majesty,

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

Charles the Second. They accepted this change as they had the others.

The crown lawyers of England held that by the conquests of war the Duke of York had lost his title, and that the treaty of Westminster conveyed New Netherland not to him, but to the King. Charles therefore gave him, June 29, 1674, a new patent with enlarged authority. A little later the Duke appointed a new governor, a man famous for years afterward, in the colonial history of America, Major Edmund Andros.

Major Andros appeared at New York at the end of October, 1674. Colve surrendered authority to him, and by proclamation absolved all from their allegiance to the Dutch Government. On the 31st Governor Andros reinstated in office those who had been magistrates on the Delaware at the time of the Dutch capture the previous year, Peter Alrich excepted, "he having proffered himself to the Dutch at their first coming, and acted very violently as their chief officer ever since." In May of the next year (1675), the Governor, accompanied by a "numerous retinue," came from New York to visit the Delaware settlements. At New Castle, on the 13th, he held an Indian Council, four chiefs from the east side of the river attending. They presented him with two belts, "fifteen and twelve wampum big," in return for which he gave them "four coates and four lap-cloathes." The gratitude of the chiefs was duly expressed; the record says: "They returned thanks and fell a-kintecoying, singing kenon! kenon!" At the same time a court was held and cases tried; a church was ordered to be built, by general taxation, at Wicaco, and that on Tinicum Island designated "to serve for Upland and parts adjacent." The penalty for selling strong liquors to the Indians "by retayle, or less than two gallons," was fixed at five pounds, and distillation of corn or grain was forbidden, under the like penalty. "A ferry boate" was ordered "to be mantayned at the Falls, on the west side," a horse and man to pay two guilders for ferriage, and a man without a horse ten stivers.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The administration of Governor Andros continued nearly seven years. He returned to England—to justify himself to the King, as to various matters, especially a controversy with Gov. Philip Carteret of East New Jersey—in 1681, leaving Captain Anthony Brockholls acting governor. His administration followed in the main the lines of Nicolls and Lovelace. It was a personal government, strictly; the Governor was the source and origin of all authority, legislative, executive, and judicial. Nothing approaching popular government, in the modern sense, was yet in view in the Delaware colony. Yet it is true that in a simple, primitive way, the people kept their own peace, administered their own justice, and directed the ordinary course of daily affairs.

This was done by the magistrates of the "Courts." Taking, now, for particular attention, the Court which usually sat at Upland (Chester)—the only one in Pennsylvania, at this period—we have its records complete from November 14, 1676, to the transfer of the province to William Penn in June, 1681. These disclose many particulars of the settlers' lives. The business transacted by the Court had a wide range. It heard and decided charges of misdemeanor, and had suits for debt, approved the indentures of apprentices and "servants," conferred with the Indians, laid taxes and imposed fines, and directed the uses to which the revenues should be applied. It granted lands, under the regulations fixed by the Governor, and heard and adjusted disputes as to titles and lines, made provision for roads, and for insane persons—gave oversight, in fact, to all affairs of the settlers.

The Upland Court justices were for several years all Swedes. As appointed by Governor Andros in 1676, and then freshly commissioned, they were Peter Cock, Peter Rambo, Israel Helm, Lace Andries, Oele Swen, and Otto Ernest Cock. These were old settlers. Isaac Helm was the chief interpreter to the Indians. Peter Cock and Peter Rambo were two of the four magistrates who met Governor Stuyvesant at Tinicum, in 1658, "with a petition for various privileges." Rambo and Helm were both living as late as 1693. Oele Swen was one of the patentees of the land at Wicaco, in 1664, and the family's houses and woods there formed part of Philadelphia as laid out for Penn in 1681.

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

Accounts in money were stated in the Dutch silver coins, guilders and stivers.¹ For keeping the Court in his house at Upland, and the "dyet" of the justices, a year, Neeles Laersen was allowed 452 guilders, or $37.66. But many accounts were stated in terms of traffic and barter. Edmund Cantwell sued John Ashman for 800 pounds of tobacco for surveying two tracts of land, and some fees. Lace Cock also sued Ashman—who appears to have become insolvent and eloped—for "sixteen ells of serge," payment for a black horse "as also a mare." John Stille claimed of Ashman twelve hundred and fifty pounds of tobacco, "to be paid in Choptank river, in Maryland," admitting an offset of "four yards of course kersey." The "widow of Thom: Jeacox" further sued the much-indebted Ashman for one thousand pounds of tobacco, the price of a horse sold him, "to be paid in goods as they cost in Maryland," deducting "8 Ells of Lockrum, and 4 Ells of blew linnen." James Sanderlins sued John Edmunds "of Maryland," on a "bill" for "1200 lb. of good and merchantable Tobacco and Caskes too be paid in Great Choptank river in Maryland." He asked an attachment on a "certaine great Boate or shiallup," which was granted, and the "vendu master" ordered to sell the boat and its appurtenances "this Courtday to the most bidders," which being done, John Test bought it for 625 guilders, "to be paid in New Castle in merchantable tobacco in casks, or tar at eight stivers a pound, or wheat at five guilders a schepel."

¹A guilder is commonly supposed to have been equal to forty cents, and a stiver two cents, American money. But it is evident that in 1676-81 the value placed on these coins was much less. The Upland Court, March, 1679-80, in a judgment on a suit for debt, awarded 2,700 stivers as equal to 3 pounds, 7 shillings, 6 pence (being 810 pence), so that a penny was equal to 3 1-3 stivers. This is confirmed by another award the same day of 3,500 stivers as equal to 4 pounds, 7 shillings, 6 pence (1,050 pence), and by the statement of the Court, June, 1680, "5 pounds, or 200 guilders." A guilder was therefore 6 pence, or 20 stivers, and counting a penny as two cents, a guilder was 12 cents of our money, and a stiver six-tenths of a cent—6 mills.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Education appears in at least one suit. Edmund Draughton demanded of Dunck Williams, who lived probably at Passyunk, 200 guilders for teaching defendant's children "to Read one

William Penn's Chair

Yeare." In this case Richard Duckett testified "hee was present at ye makeing of ye bargaine," and that it was agreed that Draughton "should Teach Dunkes Childeren to Read in ye bybell, and if hee could doe itt in a yeare, or a halfe yeare, or a quarter," he was to receive the two hundred guilders. The Court held his claim good. Edmund Draughton, we may note as we pass, was the first tutor or teacher in Pennsylvania, of whom we have account.

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

The selling of "servants" for a term of years is recorded in several cases. "Anthony Neelson Long brought into Court a certayne man servant named William Goaf, whoeme hee has bought of Moens Petersen for the full term of three years servitude, the sd William Goaf being present in Court did owne the same, and did faithfully promise to serve his said master honestly, and trulye ye abovesd Terme of 3 years." Again: "Mr. John Test brought in Court a certaine man servant named William Still, being a taylor by traede, whome hee did acknowledge to have sold unto Capt. Edmund Cantwell for the space and terme of foure yeares." Benjamin Goodman petitioned the Court to be discharged from service. He had been sold "by Mr. Charles Ballard, of ye province of Maryland unto Oele Swenson of this river," for three years, which term had expired, but Swenson denied him his freedom. The Court granted the petition. Attorney for Daniel Juniper "of Accomacq," Virginia, appeared in Court and declared he had sold to Israel Helm "a certayne man servant" named William Bromfield, "for ye terme and space of four years," for 1,200 guilders—which the Court confirmed. Peter Bacon, who had sued Captain Christopher Billop for 1,080 guilders for the use of a horse, taken from Passyunk to Billop's plantation on Staten Island and worked there four months till he was in a "sad and poore condition," and for other charges, obtained a judgment against the defendant, and levied on his "servant," Justa Justassen, who was "in the hands of Lasse Cock." Three appraisers found the remaining time of the man's service worth 650 guilders, so Bacon recovered that much on his claim.

A handwritten signature in cursive script, reading "John Blackwell". The signature is written in dark ink on a light background.

Signature of John Blackwell, deputy-governor, 1688-1690

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The Court adjusted numerous suits in an amicable way. Albert Hendrics complained of Andries Bertles that he had killed his "boare, with a gun." The defendant said the animal was "so cruell that no man could passe without danger." The Court recommended them "mutually to compose the business between themselves." Oele Oelson abused and assaulted ("so that his shirt was all torne in peeces"), the estimable Israel Helm, a justice of the Court—to the great scandal of every one. Oelson was ordered to pay a fine of 150 guilders, and "humbly ask forgiveness of Justice Israel Helm and the Court." This was "openly done by the sd Oele," and then the Court and Sheriff "considering that he was a poor man with a great charge of children," remitted the fine, "upon his humble submission." Neeles Laersen complained of John Test that the latter had been "troublesome to his son about a knyfe," and desired "to know the reason of the same." They were urged "to be friends and forgive one the other," to which they agreed. Hans Petersen and the "dominie," the Lutheran minister, Laurentius Carolus, had a suit about a mare, but they arranged it themselves, dividing the costs. Claes Cram sued Hans Petersen for defamation, the latter having called him "a thief," and charged him with acquiring "all his riches" by robbery. Hans was unable to justify his charges and was ordered to "openly declare himself a Lyar," in the Court, further to "declare the plaintiff to bee an honest man," and pay, besides, a fine and costs of suit—all of which he appears to have done.

Such are some of the cases before the justices at Upland in that day. There were others more serious, but none is recorded of a grade above ordinary misdemeanors. "Differences" arose, in numerous cases, from one of the parties being "in liquor." The Court's proceedings bear the mark of simple dignity and plain justice.

Interesting almost above all other business was the poll-tax laid by the Court in November, 1677. This is the first general tax of which we have a complete record, though others have been mentioned in preceding pages of this history. The Court's minutes say:

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

"The Court takeing into consideracon the Levy or Pole money for the defraying of the publicq Charges whereof the acct. was made upp the Last Court, and calling over the List of the Tydable persons in their jurisdiction, doe find that for the payment of the sd charges from every tydable prson must be collected and received the sume of twenty and six guilders, to be paid in either of the following species (viz.) wheat at fyve, rey and barley at four gilders pr scipple,¹ Indian Corne at three gilders per scipple; Tobacco at 8 styvers per pound; porke at 8 and bacon at 16 styvers per pound; or else in wampum or skins at current prices."

The "high Sherrife," Captain Edmund Cantwell, was directed to collect the tax from the list of persons furnished him by the Court, and was authorized to distrain upon the property of any refusing payment. He was to return his account to the Court before March 25 (New Year day) next ensuing, and was to have "5 shillings in the pound"—twenty-five per cent.—commission on his collections.

The "List of Tydable persons" within the Court's jurisdiction, from Christina creek to the Falls of the Delaware, has much historic interest. It contains 136 names, residing as follows: In the district of Tacony, which included Philadelphia and all north of it, 65; at Carkoen's Hook (the settlers on Darby creek and as far west as Cobb's creek), 10; at Calkoen's Hook (between Cobb's and Crum creeks), 15; at Upland, 19; at Marreties (Marcus) Hook, 19; and on the east bank of the Delaware (in New Jersey), 10.

It will be seen that excluding the New Jersey names rather more than half of the whole number were in the Tacony district.

¹"Scipple"—schepel, a bushel. This would be sixty cents for wheat, forty-eight for rye and barley, thirty-six for corn. The tobacco and pork would be 4.8 cents a pound, and the bacon 9.6 cents.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The number south of the Pennsylvania line must have been very small, as there were but nineteen altogether at Marcus Hook, and below. The list includes all males between the ages of sixteen and sixty, except a few officials, justices of the courts and others, who were exempt from such tax. The whole number of white persons, of all ages and both sexes, on the west bank of the Delaware, within the present State of Pennsylvania, at this time, might be estimated at from four hundred to five hundred.

Sheriff Cantwell made his return to the Court sitting "att the house of Justice Peter Cock, in ye Schuylkill," on the 3d of

A handwritten signature in cursive script, reading "Jos. Growdon". The signature is written in dark ink on a light background.

Signature of Joseph Growdon, member of the Assembly, 1690

April, 1678. He was allowed for seven "tydables" who were "not Lyable to pay." He returned, therefore, for 129 taxable persons at 26 guilders per head, 3,354 guilders, on which he was allowed 884 guilders as his commission. The net proceeds he was directed to pay to sundry persons, including Neeles Laerson, for entertaining the Court, 639 guilders; Lacey Cock for expenses of the Commander (Captain John Collier), and the Seneca Indians, in the spring of 1677, 250 guilders; bounty on wolves' heads, 420 guilders; Ephraim Herman, clerk of the Court, for several "extraordinary services," 200 guilders; Justice Israel Helm, "for his severall services to ye Contry as Interpreter about ye Indians," 400 guilders.

The names upon the tax list are with rare exceptions those of Swedes. A few English names, however, had begun to appear, nearly all at Upland. One of those living there was Robert Wade. He came from London, with the Salem, N. J., settlers, on the ship Griffith, in 1675, and bought in March of that year from Madam Papegoia the "Printzdorp" property, and another

A Short DESCRIPTION
OF Pennsilvania,

Or, A Relation What things are known, enjoyed, and like to be discovered in in the said Province.

and as a Token of Good Will sent of England.

By Richard Frame.

Printed and Sold by William Bradford in Philadelphia, 1692.

Title page of English book to induce Immigration to Pennsylvania

Photographed especially for this work by J. F.
Sachse from the only known original in Philadelphia Library

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

tract—which she had just bought of Neils Mattson—making 560 acres in all. He called his home “Essex House.” Another at Upland was James Sandelands. (The entry on the List is “James Sanderling and slave.”) He was probably a Scotchman, and had come to the Delaware as one of the Duke of York’s soldiers, at least as early as 1668. He married Ann, the daughter of Urien Keen, one of the Swedish immigrants who came with Printz, in 1643, and becoming a large landholder and prosperous man. Another at Upland was John Test, a merchant, “of London,” who had lately come. Richard Noble, who was appointed surveyor for the Delaware, in succession to Walter Wharton, at the death of the latter, in 1678, is also recorded at Upland, as is Richard Bovington, obviously an Englishman. Under Tacony is entered “Mr. Jones, the hatter.”

The payments to Lacey Cock and Israel Helm in connection with the Indians are an index to a passage of Indian history which may be here mentioned. The Susquehannas, after their overthrow by the Iroquois—chiefly the Seneca tribe—had become scattered. In the Council at New York, August 4, 1676, it was resolved “to write to Captain Cantwell still to encourage the coming in of those Indians,” but, until they came, “not to promise or engage anything to them, but, if they desire it the Governor will endeavor the compromise of all things in Maryland, and endeavor a peace with the Maques [Mohawks] and Sinekes, after which the sd Indvans may return to their land as they shall think good.” Temporarily, those who came in might be placed at the Falls, “or the middle of the river, at Delaware”—i. e. New Castle. Captain John Collier—successor to Capt. John Carr as “Commander”—was ordered to carry a letter of Governor Andros to the Maryland government, and confer about the Susquehannas. If Maryland would not receive them, he might say that Andros was willing to do so.

In the following year, April (1677), the Council at New York wrote to Captain Collier: “If the Susquehannas in any part of ye Government your way will come hither (as was told them last year), and resolve to leave off ye Warre, they shall have a convenient place assigned them to their content, or may go and live with ye Maquas or any other our Indyans," or "go back where they will." But they were not to be allowed to live on the South river, and the river Indians were not to suffer their doing so, "it being dangerous for both."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Connected with these letters is a minute of a special meeting of the magistrates of the Upland Court with the "Commander,"

A handwritten signature in cursive script, reading "Wm Clarke". The letters are dark and fluid, with a large, stylized 'C' at the end.

Signature of William Clarke, member of Provincial Council, 1682;
speaker of Assembly, 1692

Captain Collier, at Upland, March 13, 1676-7, "upon the news of the Sineco Indians comming downe to fetch the Susquehannas that were amongst these River Indians." It was resolved, "upon the motions of Rinowehan, the Indian Sachomore," that Capt. Collier and Justice Helm "goe up to Sachamexin [Shackamax-on], where at present a great number of Simico and other Indians are, and that they endeavor to persuade the Simecus, the Susquehannos, and these River Indians to send each a Sachomore or Deputy to his Honor the Governor att New Yorke, and that Justice Israel Helm goe with them."

Drawing on, now, toward the time of William Penn's great grant, there were increasing evidences of new life on the Delaware. The tide of English immigration to the east bank of the river, so long almost unoccupied, testified to an awakened interest in the country. The settlements at Salem in 1675, and Burlington in 1677, stirred the settlers on the west side. Many new grants of land were asked for in the Upland Court, from 1677 onward, the majority by Swedes, but others by men of English blood. Though these grants were mostly near the Delaware, some were on the Schuylkill, and one of 300 acres "att ye place called Wiessahitkonk," the Wissahickon of later day. Julian Hartsfelder got a patent from Gov. Andros, in 1676, for 350 acres in what is now Philadelphia. Elizabeth Kinsey, daughter of John Kinsey, of the Burlington company, appeared in March, 1678, as a land-owner at Shackamaxon, where afterward she and her husband, Thomas Fairman, the surveyor, lived, near the place of the Great

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

A handwritten signature in cursive script, reading "Ben Fletcher". The signature is written in dark ink on a light background.

Signature of Benjamin Fletcher, captain-general and governor-in-chief, 1693

Treaty with the Indians. Other English names come into the record—William Clayton, at Marcus Hook, William Warner, on the Schuylkill, William Woodmancy at Upland. In the commissions of the Justices of Upland Court, in May, 1680, there were two English appointments, Henry Jones and George Browne—the latter living at the Falls. William Biles also settled at the Falls, and was appointed to various offices there, including that of constable and "surveyor and overseer of the highways from the Falls to Poetquessing creek." We shall hear of him later.

The detachment of the settlers above the Christina—forming the Pennsylvania community—became more definite in the time of Andros. The jurisdiction of the Court at Upland was more carefully marked. November 12, 1678, the record says:

"The limits and division between this and New Castle County were this day agreed upon and settled by this Court and Mr. John Moll, president of New Castle Court, to bee as followeth, viz.:

"This county of Upland to begin from the north side of Oele Fransen's Creeke, otherwise called Steenkill, lying in the boght above ye Verdrietige hoeck, and from the said creek over to ye singeltree point on the Eastsyde of this river."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The line between the two jurisdictions—Upland and New Castle—had been the Christina creek, but the line now drawn left the settlers about Christina to attend at New Castle, which was obviously more convenient. The "Steenkill," or Stony creek, at Oele Fransen's, was the stream later known as Quarryville creek, in the present State of Delaware, nearly four miles below the mouth of Naaman's creek. "Single tree Point," on the New Jersey shore, has been known as Oldman's Point, a mile below the mouth of Oldman's creek.

The designation "county" became commonly employed. The Upland record says (March 10, 1679-80), Richard Noble produced his commission as "Surveyor of this County." In June, 1680, it is minuted that: "In regard that Uplande Creeke, where ye Court hitherto has sate is att ye lower end of ye County, the Court therefore, for ye most care of ye people have thought fitt for ye future to sitt and meet att ye Towne of Kingsess, in ye Schuylkills."

The details already given will fairly describe the conditions surrounding the settlers at the close of the pioneer period. A few more may be briefly given. There were as yet no roads—simply paths for horses and foot-passengers, and cartways where merchandise was to be transported. Where these ran through the woods, as was frequent, they were marked by "blazed" trees, which travellers found it difficult to follow. In November, 1678, the Court "ordered that every person should within the space of two months as far as his land reaches, make good and passable ways from neighbor to neighbor, with bridges where it needs, to the end that neighbors on occasion may come together." But there were certainly no bridges soon built, notwithstanding this order; the fording of the streams was for a long time one of the greatest difficulties and dangers to travellers. In October, 1680, the Court decided it necessary to appoint "overseers of highways and roads, and overseers and viewers of bridges throughout this county," and made selections accordingly. Six months later, John Champion was fined twenty-five guilders, on the complaint of the overseer of the roads, "for his not working upon ye highway when due warning was given him."

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

The provision of mills, as well as roads and bridges, was a matter of concern. The "Swedes' Mill," on Cobb's creek, set up by Printz, in 1643, continued for many years in use, and grain was carried long distances to be ground there. Complaint was made to Upland Court in March, 1667-8, that people were "dayly taking up of land neare the mill," and it "would be left destitute of any land to gett timber for ye use of ye said mill," so the Court ordered one hundred acres to be laid out on the west side of the creek for the mill's use. The Dutch settlers at Christina had a mill on Shellpot creek—"Turtle Kill"—near the present city of Wilmington. In November, 1678, Upland Court granted Jan Schoeten "a small quantity of marrish att ye place called Hans Moensen's great mill fall," the quantity to be enough to "cut four stacks of hay," and at the same time, considering it "very necessary that a mill be built in the Schuylkill," designated this stream of Moensen's as the place, he promising to erect a mill. The stream was Mill Creek, which enters the Schuylkill below Woodlands Cemetery, Philadelphia. The English settlers on the east bank of the Delaware were provided for by Mahlon Stacy, who built in 1679 a log mill on the south bank of the Assunpink, where Trenton now stands. To this mill the Bucks county settlers took their grain in canoes across the river, in this early time.

The condition of the people in respect to ministry and churches was necessarily poor. There was a church of the Dutch Reformed faith at New Castle, to the charge of which Petrus Tesschenmaker, a young "licensed bachelor in divinity" from Utrecht, was inducted in the autumn of 1678. He preached there some three years, then went to Staten Island, and thence to Schenectady, where in the attack by the French and Indians, in 1690, he was killed. The Swedes, after the departure of Risingh in 1653, had but one minister on the river, the man who was variously called Laers, Laurentius Carolus, Lock, Lokenius, etc.,

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Great Meeting House, Philadelphia

Erected at Second and High streets in 1695, and "great" as it then was, it was taken down in 1755 to be made "greater." In 1808, the building was sold and afterwards demolished.

a poor fellow whose missteps and mischances, moral lapses and legal misdemeanors are repeatedly mentioned in the scanty chronicle of the time. He preached in the church at Tinicum island that Printz built, and at Crane Hook, between Christina and New Castle, where a log church was built about 1667. In 1672 another Lutheran minister came to the Delaware, Jacobus Fabritius. He had trouble with the authorities, and was suspended, but in

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

1677 came to have charge in the block-house church at Wicaco, where he preached his first sermon on Trinity Sunday of that year. This church at Wicaco was the second place of public worship in Pennsylvania—Tinicum only preceding it—and the first place in Philadelphia. Fabritius continued a pastor for fourteen years, until about 1691, but was totally blind from 1682. He died in 1693. Lock had died in 1688.

At the close of the year 1680—in March, according to the old calendar—the pioneer period was ending. The hardships of the earliest beginnings were over. They had been, on the whole, small when compared with what the first settlers elsewhere in the eastern colonies of America had endured. No destructive war, no deadly conflicts with the natives, no pestilence, no famine, had visited the Delaware settlements. There had been the usual diseases of a new country, there had been scanty food, coarse apparel, and rude shelter, there had been loneliness and homesickness, but on the whole the experience of over seventy years, since Hudson looked inside the capes' door, had served to show that here, without great cost in life or treasure, the homes of a new commonwealth might be prosperously planted.

A handwritten signature in cursive script that reads "Sam: Carpenter". The letters are fluid and connected, with a prominent 'S' at the beginning and a long, sweeping tail on the 'r'.

Signature of Samuel Carpenter, assistant in Government under Markham, 1695

Far detached from the life of the settlers on the Delaware, an episode of romantic interest claims attention before we dismiss this period. It relates to the discovery of western Pennsylvania by white men. We have described the exploration by Champlain's guide, Etienne Brulé, in middle Pennsylvania, in 1615-16. We turn now to the probable discovery of the Allegheny and Ohio rivers by La Salle, in 1669.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

That La Salle came in that year from Canada through New York, passed from the shore of Lake Erie by Chautauqua lake or a route further south to the headwaters of the Allegheny, descended that river to the Ohio, and passed down the Ohio to the Falls near Louisville, is a theory supported by evidence, and made very likely, if not fully proved. If he did make this journey at or about that time, he was, so far as history knows, the first white man to visit Pennsylvania west of the mountains, and his tour down the Allegheny and Ohio was the earliest exploration of those rivers by a European.

It may be stated briefly: (1) The French afterward claimed possession of western Pennsylvania, and based their claim upon the discovery of "the Ohio and its tributaries" by La Salle. (2) La Salle, in the period 1669-73, as in other years, was engaged in expeditions of discovery from Canada; as to all other years his movements are well known, but as to this period his own accounts are totally lost. (3) An account remains, however, published in Paris, probably in 1678, and derived, it is said, from a number of conversations by the author with La Salle. This contains a brief, and in some points geographically inaccurate, description of a tour like that outlined above—Lake Erie to the Allegheny, to the Ohio, to the Falls. (4) This account from the "conversations" receives confirmation in the memorial which La Salle himself addressed to Count Frontenac, French Governor of Canada, in 1677, in which he then declared that he had previously discovered the Ohio, and had descended it as far as a fall, which obstructed it. (5) It is further confirmed by maps which Louis Joliet, his rival, made, showing the region of the Mississippi and the Great Lakes; on each of them the Ohio is presented, and with the inscription that it was discovered by La Salle.

That it was he who first of all men descended the Ohio "may then be regarded as established," says Francis Parkman, than whom there is no higher authority on such a subject. But in our present discussion we should wish to know where he entered the Ohio. Was it in northwestern Pennsylvania, over a portage between tributaries of Lake Erie and the Allegheny? Most likely. That furnishes an easy and natural route. It is the route which was afterward taken by the French from the Lakes to the Ohio valley. It is vaguely suggested in the "conversations" account. Such a route by La Salle would be needful, in order to give basis to the claim that he discovered the "tributaries" of the Ohio, as well as the main river.

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

It is pleasant to connect the discovery of the State's splendid western section with the name and fame of the intrepid French explorer—"the foremost pioneer of the Great West," as Parkman has named him. We believe it historically safe to do so.

But La Salle is further connected with Pennsylvania. The picturesque and striking episode of the building of the Griffin, in 1678-9, on the shore of Lake Erie, the voyage of the ship in 1679, and its disastrous and mysterious shipwreck, is a story which belongs to the waters that wash our northwestern shore, and whose tradition for more than two centuries has persisted there.

This, then, is the story of the Griffin. She was the first sail-vessel on the Great Lakes. Bent upon their further exploration, and a trade with the Indians which might enable him to repay those who had helped him equip his costly expeditions, La Salle built, at the mouth of Cayuga creek, on the Niagara river, six miles above the great cataract, a rude vessel of forty-five tons. In the spring of 1679 she was launched. "Five small cannon looked out from her port-holes; and on her prow was carved a portentous monster, the griffin, whose name she bore, in honor of the armorial bearings of Frontenac." It was August before La Salle, who had been forced to visit Canada meantime, to baffle importunate creditors and envious enemies, was ready to proceed; it was the seventh of that month when, having overcome the swift current of the Niagara river by towing, they entered the Lake, chanted the Te Deum, fired a salute of cannon, and "plowed the virgin waves of Lake Erie, where sail was never seen before." They passed along the shore where Buffalo now stands, by the peninsula which in La Salle's language was for many a year called Presque Isle, where Erie is located, and so journeyed on to the West and the upper lakes. There, on an island at the entrance of Green Bay, La Salle loaded the vessel with the furs which his men had gathered, and decided to send her back to Niagara, where her cargo might appease his clamorous creditors, leaving him to press on in his explorations. "It was a rash resolution, for it involved trusting her to the pilot, who had already proved either incompetent or treacherous." On the 18th of September they parted, the Griffin eastward, he on his perilous way to Illinois. Baffled there, he built Fort Crevecoeur, near where Peoria now stands, and returned in the winter, on foot, to Canada, asking anxiously for the Griffin. Where she was no one could tell him. She had disappeared! La Salle believed the pilot and crew had wrecked her, and escaped with the goods she carried to the Indians of the Northwest. Many other stories of her fate were told. But there is little doubt that she was lost, whether by design or accident, on the lake shore near where she was built. The Jesuits—enemies of La Salle—had a tradition that she was driven ashore in a gale, her crew killed by the Indians, and her goods plundered. Articles found imbedded in the sand, near Buffalo, a century or more after—an anchor, and rusted guns bearing French inscriptions—were thought to have belonged to the ill-fated ship.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

DANKERS AND SLUYTER'S JOURNAL.¹

17th, [November, 1679] Friday.— . . . Most of the English, and many others, have their houses made of nothing but clapboards, as they call them there, in this manner: they first make a wooden frame, the same as they do in Westphalia, and at Altona, but not so strong; they then split the boards of clapwood, so that they are like Cooper's pipe staves, except they are not bent. These are made very thin, with a large knife, so that the thickest end

¹The journal of these men, Jasper Dankers and Peter Sluyter, has been referred to in the preceding chapter. They were from Frisia, in the Netherlands, and had become members of a communistic religious body in Germany, followers of Jean de Labadie.

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

is about a pinck (little finger) thick, and the other is made sharp, like the edge of a knife. They are about five or six feet long, and are nailed on the outside of the frame, with the ends lapped over each other. They are not usually laid so close together as to prevent you from sticking a finger between them, in consequence either of their not being well joined, or the boards being crooked. When it is cold and windy, the best people plaster them with clay. Such are most all the English houses in the country, except those they have which were built by people of other nations. . .

18th, Saturday.—About ten o'clock, after we had breakfasted, we stepped into a boat, in order to proceed on our journey down the river. The ebb tide was half run out. . . We went along, then, moving with the tide; but as Ephraim was suffering with the quartan ague, and it was now its time to come on, we had to go and lie by the banks of the river, in order to make a fire, as he could not endure the cold in the boat. This continued for about an hour and a half. The water was then rising, and we had to row against the current to Burlington, leaving the island of Matinakonk lying on the right hand. This island formerly belonged to the Dutch governor, who had made it a pleasure ground or garden, built good houses upon it, and sowed and planted it. He also dyked and cultivated a large piece of meadow or marsh, from which he gathered more grain than from any land which had been made from woodland into tillable land. The English governor at the Manathans now held it for himself, and had hired it out to some Quakers, who were living upon it at present. It is the best and largest island in the South river; and is about four English miles in length, and two in breadth. It lies nearest to the east side of the river. At the end of this island lies the Quakers' village, Burlington, . . . As we were now at the village, we went up to the ordinary tavern, but there were no lodgings to be obtained there, whereupon we re-embarked in the boat, and rowed back to Jacob Hendricks', who received us very kindly, and entertained us according to his ability. The house, although not much larger than where we were the last night, was somewhat better and tighter, being made according to the Swedish mode, and as they usually build their houses here, which are block-houses, being nothing else than entire trees, split through the middle, or squared out of the rough, and placed in the form of a square, upon each other, as high as they wish to have the house; the ends of these timbers are let into each other, about a foot from the ends, half of one into half of the other. The whole structure is thus made, without a nail or a spike. The ceiling and roof do not exhibit much finer work, except among the most careful people, who have the ceiling planked and a glass window. The doors are wide enough, but very low, so that you have to stoop in entering. These houses are quite tight and warm; but the chimney is placed in a corner. My comrade and myself had some deer skins spread upon the floor to lie on, and we were, therefore, quite well off, and could get some rest. It rained hard during the night, and snowed and froze. . .

They had come to America to seek a place to which the Labadists might remove, and they ultimately secured from Augustine Herman a part of his great tract, the Bohemia Manor, in Maryland. The journal is harsh and censorious in tone (especially in referring to the Quakers), but describes the Delaware between Trenton and New Castle as it appeared in the early winter of 1679 better than any other document which remains to us.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

19th, Sunday.—. . . At noon the weather improved, and Ephraim having something to do at Burlington, we accompanied him there in the boat. . . We tasted here, for the first time, peach brandy, or spirits, which was very good, but would have been better if it had been more carefully made. . .

20th, Monday.—We went again to the village this morning. . . It was almost noon before we left. The boat in which we had come as far as there with its owner, who intended to return in it, was exchanged for another, belonging to Upland, of which a Quaker was master, who was going down with several others of the same class. . . We arrived about two o'clock at the house of another Quaker, on the west side of the river, where we stopped to eat our dinner and dry ourselves. We left there in an hour, rowing our best against the flood tide, until, at dark, we came to Takanij, a village of Swedes and Fins, situated on the west side of the river. Ephraim being acquainted, and having business here, we were all well received, and slept upon a parcel of deer skins. We drank very good beer here, brewed by the Swedes. . .

Signature of John Goodson, assistant in Government under Markham, 1695

21st, Tuesday.—The tide falling, we set out with the day, and rowed during the whole ebb and part of the flood, until two or three o'clock, when we arrived at the island of Tynakonk [Tinicum] the fifth we had passed. Mantinakonk and this Tinakonk, are the principal islands, and the best and the largest. The others are of little importance, and some of them, whose names we do not know, are all meadow and marsh, others are only small bushes. . . This Tinakonk is the island of which M. Arnout de la Grange had said so much. . . It lies on the west side of the river, and is separated from the west shore . . . by a small creek, as wide as a large ditch, running through a meadow. It is long and covered with bushes, and inside somewhat marshy. It is about two miles long, or a little more, and a mile and a half wide. . . The southwest point, which only has been and is still cultivated, is barren, scraggy, and sandy, growing plenty of wild onions, a weed not easily eradicated. On this point three or four houses are standing, built by the Swedes, a little Lutheran church made of logs, and the remains of the large block-house, which served them in place of a fortress, with the ruins of some log huts. This is the whole of the manor.

When we arrived at this island, we were welcomed by Mr. Otto [Ernest Cock] late medicus, and entertained at his house according to his condition, although he lives poorly enough. . .

22nd, Wednesday.—It was rainy all this day, which gave us sufficient time to explore the island. We had some good cider which he had made out of the fruit from the remains of an old orchard planted by the Swedish governor. . . We saw an ox as large as they have in Friesland or Denmark, and also quite fat—a species of which we have observed more among the Swedes, and which thrive well. It clearing up towards evening, we took a canoe and came after dark to Upland. This is a small village of Swedes, although it is now overrun by English. We went to the house of the Quaker who had brought us down, and carried the other persons from Tinakonk. . . .

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

23d, Thursday.—It was late before we left here, and we therefore had time to look around a little, and see the remains of the residence of Madam Papegay, who had had her dwelling here when she left Tinakonk. We had nowhere seen so many vines together as we saw here, which had been planted for the purpose of shading the walks on the river side, in between the trees. . . . When the meal [dinner] was finished, Ephraim obtained a horse for himself and his wife, and we followed him on foot, carrying our traveling bags. . . . After we had proceeded about three hours, our guide missed the way, and we had gone a good distance before he became aware of it, and would have gone on still further if we had not told him that we thought the course we were going was wrong. We therefore left one road, and went straight back in search of the other which we at length found. A man overtook us who was going the same way, and we followed him. We crossed the Schilt-pads kil [Tortoise or Turtle creek], where there was a fall of water over the rocks, affording a site for a grist-mill which was erected there. This Schilt-pads kil is nothing but a branch or arm of Christina kil, into which it discharges itself, and is so named on account of the quantities of tortoises which are found there. Having crossed it we came to the house of the miller, who was a Swede or Holsteiner whom they usually call Tapoesie. . . .

24th, Friday.—Ephraim having some business here, we did not leave very speedily. This miller had shot an animal they call a muskrat, the skin of which we saw hanging up to dry. He told us they were numerous in the creeks. . . . It was about noon when we were set across the creek in a canoe. We proceeded thence a small distance over land to a place where the fortress of Christina had stood which had been constructed and possessed by the Swedes, but taken by the Dutch Governor, Stuyvesant, and afterwards, I believe, demolished by the English. We went into a house here belonging to some Swedes, with whom Ephraim had some business. We were then taken over Christina creek in a canoe, and landed at the spot where Stuyvesant threw up his battery to attack the fort, and compelled them to surrender. At this spot there are many medlar trees which bear good fruit, from which one Jaquet, who does not live far from here, makes good brandy or spirits, which we tasted and found even better than Franch brandy. Ephraim obtained a horse at this Jaquet's, and rode on towards Santhock, now New-castle, and we followed him on foot, his servant leading the way. We arrived about four o'clock at Ephraim's house. . . .

25th, Saturday.—We rested a little to-day. Ephraim and his wife and we ourselves had several visits from different persons who came to welcome us, as Mons. Jan Moll, whom we had conversed with in New York, and who now offered us his house and all things in it, even pressing them upon us. But we were not only contented with our present circumstances, but we considered that we would not be doing right to leave Ephraim's house without reason. . . . Peter Aldrix also showed us much attention, as did others, to all of which we returned our thanks. We went out to view this little place, which is not of much moment, consisting of only forty or fifty houses. There is a fine prospect from it, as it lies upon a point of the river where I took a sketch.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

26th, Sunday.—We went to the church, but the minister, Tessemaker, who has to perform service in three places, over the river, Newcastle, and Apoquemene, was to-day over the river, and there was, therefore, nothing done, except what was done by a poor limping clerk, as he was a cripple and poor in body. He read from a book a sermon, or short explanation, and sung and made a prayer, if it may be called such, and then the people went home. In the afternoon there was a prelection again about the catechism. . . . [From New Castle they went to Maryland, returning on the 15th of December. They remained there ten days, finding it difficult to arrange for a boat up the river.]

[December] 25th, Monday.—The weather being good, we spoke again to our Swedes, but they continued obstinate; and also to Jan Boeyer, but nothing could be done with him either. While we were standing on the shore talking with them about leaving, I saw coming down the river a boat which looked very much like that of the Quaker of Upland, as indeed it was. He landed at Newcastle and was going to Ephraim's house, where he had some business to transact, intending to leave the next day. We asked him if he was willing to take us with him, and he said, he would do so with pleasure.

26th, Tuesday.—All the letters having been collected together, which we were to take with us and deliver, and the Quaker having finished his business, we breakfasted together, and courteously took leave of all our acquaintances. . . . We will observe before leaving Sand-hoek, that it has always been the principal place on the South river, as well in the time of the English as of the Dutch. It is now called New Castle by the English. . . . Formerly all ships were accustomed to anchor here, for the purpose of paying duties or obtaining permits, and to unload, when the goods were carried away by water in boats or barks, or by land in carts. It was much larger and more populous at that time, and had a small fort called Nassau; but since the country has belonged to the English, ships may no longer come here, or they must first declare and unload their cargoes at New York, which has caused this little place to fall off very much, and even retarded the settlement of plantations. What remains of it consists of about fifty houses, most all of wood. The fort is demolished, but there is a good block-house, having some small cannon, erected in the middle of the town, and sufficient to resist the Indians or an incursion of Christians; but it could not hold out long.

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

Returning now to our boat, it left about ten o'clock for a place a little higher up the river, where they had to take in some wheat, and where we were to go on foot, with the Quaker's wife. We reached it about noon, and found the boat laden, and lying high up on the land, so that we had to wait until the tide was half flood. We saw there a piece of meadow or marsh, which a Dutch woman had dyked in, and which they assured us had yielded an hundred for one, of wheat, notwithstanding the hogs had done it great damage. The boat getting afloat, we left about three o'clock, and moved up with the tide. The weather was pleasant and still, with a slight breeze sometimes from the west, of which we availed ourselves; but it did not continue long, and we had to rely upon our oars. We arrived at Upland about seven o'clock in the evening, and it was there only half flood, so much later does the tide make there than at New Castle. The Quaker received us kindly, gave us supper, and counseled with us as to how we should proceed further. . . .

Signature of John Simcocks, speaker of the Assembly, 1696

27th, Wednesday.—It rained some during the night and it was very misty early in the morning. Before the tide served to leave, we agreed with this man who had brought us up, to send us in his boat to Burlington, with two boys to manage it, paying him twenty guilders for the boat, and three guilders a day to each of the boys for three days, amounting in the whole to thirty-eight guilders; but one of the boys wishing too much, he determined to take us up himself. A good wind coming out of the south, we breakfasted and dined in one meal, and left about ten o'clock, with a favorable wind and tide, though at times the wind was quite sharp. We sailed by Tinakonk again, but did not land there. It began at noon to rain very hard, and continued so the whole day, and also blew quite hard. We ran aground on the lee shore upon a very shallow and muddy place, from which we got off with difficulty. On account of this and other accidents, if we had had the boys it would have been bad for us. We arrived at Wykakoe, a Swedish village on the west side of the river, in the evening at dusk, where we went, all wet, into the house of one Otto, who had three children lying sick with the small-pox. We dried ourselves here partly. He gave us supper and took us to sleep altogether in a warm stove room, which they use to dry their malt in and other articles. It was very warm there, and our clothes in the morning were entirely dry.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

28th, Thursday.—It was flood at daylight when we left. . . . The weather was foggy, but when the sun had risen a little, it cleared away and became pleasant and calm. We therefore advanced rapidly, rowing with the tide, and reached Takany of which we have before spoken, about ten o'clock, and where we landed a person who had come up with us. We continued on, and as the tide just commenced rising there we had a constant flood tide with us to Burlington, where we arrived about two o'clock. We were put ashore on an island of Peter Aldrix, who had given us a letter of recommendation to a person living there, and working for him. We paid Robert Wade, who and his wife are the best Quakers we have found. They have always treated us kindly. He went immediately over to Burlington, where he did not stop long, and took the ebb tide and rowed with it down the river. . . .

The man who lived on this island was named Barent, and came from Groningen. He was at a loss to know how to get us on further. Horses, absolutely, he could not furnish us; and there was no Indian about to act as a guide, as they had all gone out hunting in the woods, and none of them had been at his house for three weeks. To accompany us himself to Achter kol or the Raritans and return, could not be accomplished in less than four days, and he would have to leave his house meantime in charge of an Indian woman from Virginia, who had left her husband, an Englishman, and with two children, one of which had the small-pox, was living with him; and she could be of no use to any one, whether Indians or other persons who might come there. . . .

Signature of John Blunston, speaker of the Assembly, 1697

About three o'clock in the afternoon a young Indian arrived with whom we agreed to act as our guide, for a duffels coat which would cost twenty-four guilders in zeewant, that is, about five guilders in the money of Holland; but he had a fowling-piece with him which he desired first to take and have repaired at Burlington, and would then come back. He accordingly crossed over, but we waited for him in vain, as he did not return. The greatest difficulty with him was, that we could not speak the Indian language, and he could not speak a word of anything else. He not coming, we asked Barent if he would not undertake the task, which, after some debate, he consented to do. He arranged his affairs accordingly and prepared himself by making a pair of shoes or foot-soles of deer skin, which are very comfortable, and protect the feet. That was done in half an hour. We were to give him thirty guilders in zeewant, with which he was satisfied.

29th, Friday.—We breakfasted, and left about ten o'clock in a canoe, which set us on the west side of the river, along which a footpath runs a part of the way, in an east northeast direction, and then through the woods north northeast. We followed this path until we came to a plantation, newly begun by a Quaker, where we rested and refreshed ourselves. We agreed with this man, who came in the house while we were there, that he should put us over the river for three guilders in zeewant. We crossed over about one o'clock, and pursued a footpath along the river, which led us to a cart road, and following that we came to the new grist-mill at the falls, which, in consequence of the great flow of water, stood in danger of being washed away. Crossing here, we began our journey in the Lord's name, for there are no houses from this point to Peskatteway, an English village on the Raritans. We had now gone twelve or thirteen miles from Peter Aldrix's island, and it was about two o'clock in the afternoon.

UNDER THE DUKE OF YORK

PASSAGE IN THE "CONVERSATIONS" ACCOUNT OF LA SALLE'S EXPEDITION OF 1669

"Cependant M. de la Salle continua son chemin par une rivière qui va de l'est à l'ouest; et passe à Onontagué [Onondaga] puis à six ou sept lieues au-dessous du Lac Erié; et estant parvenu jusqu'au 28^{me} ou 31^{me} degré de longitude, et jusqu'au 41^{me} degré de latitude, trouva un sault qui tombe vers l'ouest dans un pays bas, marescajeux, tous couvert de vieilles souches, dont il y en a quelques-unes qui sont encore sur pied. Il fut donc contraint de prendre terre, et suivant une hauteur qui le pouvoit mener loin, il trouva quelque sauvages, qui luy dirent que fort loin de là le mesme fleuve qui se perdoit dans cette terre basse et vaste se réunissoit en un lit. Il continua donc son chemin, mais comme la fatigue estoit grande, 23 or 24 hommes qu'il avoit memes jusque là le quittèrent tous en une nuit, regagnèrent le fleuve, et le sauvèrent, les uns à la Nouvelle Hollande, et les autres à la Nouvelle Angleterre. Il se vit donc seul à 400 lieues de chez luy, où il ne laisse pas de revenir, remontant la rivière, et vivant de chasse, d'herbes, et de ce que luy donnèrent les sauvages qu'il rencontra en son chemin."

[Meanwhile M. de la Salle continued his journey by a stream which flows from east to west, and passed Onondaga; then at a distance of six or seven leagues below Lake Eric, and having reached the 28th or 28^{3d} degree of longitude, and as far as the 41st degree of latitude, he found a waterfall, which falls toward the west into a region low, swampy, quite covered with old stumps, of which some are still standing. So he was forced to land, and following a ridge which promised to carry him far, he found a few savages who told him that very far from there the same river which disappeared in that wide low land united again in a bed. So he went on his way, but as the effort was very fatiguing, 23 or 24 men that he had led that far all left him, during the same night, went back to the river and decamped, some to New Holland, and others to New England. So he found himself alone at 400 leagues from home, when he lost no time in returning, re-ascending the stream, and living on game, on herbs, and on what the savages whom he met on the way gave him.]

CHAPTER VI

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

THE personality of William Penn was woven into the fabric of his colony. It is hardly possible to sever the two, or to understand the one without a good knowledge of the other.

We return, therefore, to the year 1644, when Printz, newly arrived on the Delaware, was ruling the Swedish settlement from his capital on Tinicum Island, and the Dutch at Manhattan, in despair over the Indian war and the other evils of Kieft's directorship, were appealing pitifully to the mother-country for succor. In that year, in October, Captain William Penn, the commander of an English warship, was at London, under orders to proceed to the coast of Ireland to help fight the battle of the Parliament against Charles the First. Captain Penn was young for the rank he held; he was twenty-three. His family, the Penns, were from the west of England—originally perhaps, from Wales—and he had been born at Bristol, then one of the chief ports for English commerce. His wife was from Holland, Margaret Jasper, the daughter of John Jasper, a merchant of Rotterdam, and he had fixed his home in London, to the east of the old city, near the Tower. Here, on the 14th of October (1644), his first child was born.

This child, our William Penn, the Founder of Pennsylvania, was educated first at Chigwell, in Essex, a few miles northeast of London. But when he was about twelve, the family removed to the south of Ireland, where Captain Penn had "estates" which Cromwell had given him—confiscated property of royalists. The boy was there some time in the charge of private tutors, but in 1660, when he was sixteen years old, he was sent a student to the University of Oxford. His father was now a vice-admiral of England, had been concerned in the restoration of the king, and had been made a knight.

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

The Oxford student, it soon developed, was quite a different person from the vice-admiral of the royal navy, though their relationship was that of father and son. Between Sir William Penn and our William Penn there was a marked divergence of character, as we shall in due time sufficiently see. The seeds of a new thought, of new life, of a revived and reformed society, were planted in the mind of the boy, to bring forth fruit later. In his childhood at Chigwell he had run and played in Hainault Forest, near by, and had even then experienced the "long, long thoughts" of his developing consciousness and conscience. He had received religious impressions, as he tells us, in his twelfth year—perhaps in Ireland after the removal thither. Coming now to Oxford, the seat of traditional "prerogative" in Church and State, at the very hour of the Restoration, when the triumph of the enemies of Puritanism was complete, he found much that shocked him—"darkness and debauchery," as he afterward described it—and his opposition to this soon brought him into a strait place.

The ordinary difficulties of a serious youth, inclined to dream dreams of reforming society, at Oxford in 1660, would have been sufficiently great, but in the course of his two years' stay there, young Penn increased them materially. He inclined to become a Quaker. We must pause a moment to consider what this implied. There was, in 1660, a new religious body gathering in England, by the preaching of George Fox, a man twenty years older than William Penn. He had begun his religious labors between 1646 and 1650, in the midland counties of England, and at the Restoration the Friends, or Quakers, were well known in most courts and jails from Cornwall to Cumberland. At Oxford, Thomas Loe, a respectable citizen, was a preacher in the small meeting which they ventured to hold there, and Penn, hearing him, was strongly influenced by his ministry.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Gloria Dei (Old Swedes') Church

The views of George Fox were far removed from those prescribed by and exemplified in the University of Oxford in the time of Charles the Second. Fox held and preached the doctrine of the Inner Light—an innate spiritual ability to be taught directly from God. Such a doctrine is subversive of ecclesiastical systems, and destructive no less to ritual and ceremonial. It is essentially a democratic doctrine, assuming the common and equal status of all men in the sight of their Maker. Moreover its logic leads to quietude of life, to a refined Puritanism of conduct—all of which was offensive indeed in the year 1660, in the University of Oxford. To have endured the Cromwellian régime had been bitterness, but to be confronted by a sect which carried even further the “levelings” of Puritanism, was not to be suffered. The Quaker preachers were therefore very commonly mobbed, and sometimes publicly whipped in that city. In 1654, two women, Elizabeth Heavens and Elizabeth Fletcher, “who came from the north of England to exhort the scholars in their colleges,” were beaten and abused, and afterward “whipped forth” from the city, while others, men and women, including Thomas Loe and his wife, were imprisoned for preaching.

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

It resulted that for his general attitude of revolt against University conditions, and especially his refusal to “conform” to the established order in the Church, in 1662 young Penn was “banished the college,” and concluded his studies there. His father was bitterly displeased. He had counted on his son’s pursuing the course he had laid out—the path of promotion in rank and wealth which he had himself with good success followed; but the prospect now was that this expectation would be wholly frustrated by the youth’s adopting views of religion and life which were fatal to a merely personal ambition.

After leaving Oxford, young Penn was sent by his father to travel on the continent; he studied theology awhile under an eminent Protestant teacher, Amyraut, at Saumur, in France, and proceeding farther on his tour, returned to London in 1664, having become somewhat influenced, probably, by his life abroad. The diary of that back-biting gossip Samuel Pepys reports him grown a "most modish person," a "fine gentleman." When the war with the Dutch followed—caused in part by the seizure of New Netherland—Admiral Penn commanded the English fleet, under the Duke of York, in the fierce naval engagement off the east coast of England, at Lowestoft, in June, 1665, and just before the battle, his son was sent to the King, once or more, with dispatches. A letter from W. P. to his father, 6th May, 1665, is as follows: "At my arrival at Harwich . . . I took post for London, and was there the next morning by almost daylight. I hastened to Whitehall, where not finding the King up, I presented myself to my Lord of Arlington and Colonel Ashburnham. At his Majesty's knocking, he was informed there was an express from the Duke; at which earnestly slipping out of his bed, he came only in his gown and slippers; who, when he saw me, said, 'Oh! is't you? how is Sir William?' He asked how you did at three several times. . . . After interrogating me about half an hour he bid me go about your business, and mine too."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The prevalence of the Plague in London sent young Penn out of town, and presently he went to Ireland, to attend to his father's property. There he remained for nearly two years, and two experiences, strongly contrasted in character, occurred to him. He was in service as a soldier, in May, 1666, under Lord Arran, at the siege of Carrickfergus—about which time the well-known picture of him, the "portrait in armor," is supposed to have been painted. A few months later, at Cork, he again heard Thomas Loe, the Oxford preacher, present the views of the Friends. The speaker employed a text which itself no doubt strongly moved his young hearer: "There is a faith which overcomes the world, and there is a faith which is overcome by the world." He spoke afterward, in his account of his journey in Germany, in 1677, of this incident as a providential rescue from the "worldly life" which he was then likely to have led, notwithstanding his earlier convictions. "It was," he said, "at this time that the Lord visited me with a certain sound and testimony of his eternal Engraved by J. G.

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

Word, through one of those the world calls Quakers, namely Thomas Loe."

From this time, near the close of the year 1667, the young man definitely united himself with the Friends, and so remained until his death, fifty-one year's later. We need not here pursue his biography, in detail. We may mention simply that Admiral Penn died in 1670, worn out at forty-nine, and his son succeeded to his estates. In April, 1672, he married Gulielma Maria Springett, daughter of Sir William Springett, a Puritan, and an officer for the Parliament, who had fallen quite early in the Civil War.

We may proceed now to connect William Penn with the colonization of America. According to a statement made years afterward, he had thought of the New World, probably as a place of refuge, in the days of his student troubles at Oxford. In a letter written in 1681, after he had obtained his charter for Pennsylvania, he says, "I had an opening of joy as to these parts, in the year 1661, at Oxford, twenty years ago." Probably the thought of a colony in America had thus long lain in his mind. It is certain that even earlier than 1661 George Fox had been making plans for a Quaker colony on the Susquehanna. Fox wrote in 1660 to Josiah Cole, an English Friend who was then—for the second time—traveling and preaching in Maryland, asking him to look for land, and Cole replied in February, 1660-61, in a letter which has particular interest for us:

"Dear George—As concerning Friends buying a piece of land of the Susquehanna Indians, I have spoken of it to them, and told them what thou said concerning it; but their answer was that there is no land that is habitable or fit for situation beyond Baltimore's liberty till they come to or near the Susquehannas' fort . . . and besides these Indians are at war with another nation of Indians, who are very numerous, and it is doubted by some that in a little space they will be so destroyed that they will not be a people."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

It was, however, the colonization of New Jersey which first definitely engaged Penn's activities in the New World. The Duke of York, in 1664, immediately upon receiving his great patent from Charles, granted the territory which is now the State of New Jersey to two of his friends, John Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret. The interests of the two were divided by a line running from the seashore northward into East and West New Jersey, Carteret taking the former and Lord Berkeley the latter. In March, 1673-4, Berkeley sold his half to John Fenwick, in trust for himself and Edward Byllinge. Fenwick and Byllinge were English Friends. Differences arose between them as to the measure of their respective interests in the purchase, and the case was referred to William Penn, who late in the year 1674 rendered his decision, by which an undivided one-tenth of West New Jersey was, with some money, given to Fenwick, and the remaining nine-tenths to Byllinge. A little later Byllinge, who was a merchant in London, became embarrassed, and made an assignment of his interest to William Penn, Gawen Lawrie, and Nicholas Lucas. Subsequently other business operations placed in Penn's hands a further interest in this half of the New Jersey colony. He became thus a leader among those who were engaged in the movement to settle West New Jersey, and his hand is visible in the several circular letters of description, instruction, etc., drawn up at this time. Those thinking of removal were cautioned in one circular of 1676 to be deliberate: "And as we formerly writ, we cannot but repeat our request unto you that in whomsoever a desire is to be concerned in this plantation, such would weigh the thing before the Lord, and not headily or rashly conclude on any such remove."

Most important of these documents was the elaborate one drawn up in England, and dated March 3, 1676, the "Concessions and Agreements of the Proprietors, Freeholders and Inhabitants of the Province of West New Jersey in America." This was signed by the three assignees of Byllinge, Gawen Lawrie,

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

William Penn, and Nicholas Lucas, by Byllinge himself, and others in England, and—at a subsequent time, certainly—by many of those who had settled on the east bank of the Delaware, including Swedes, Dutch, and English. This document became the charter and constitution for the West Jersey colony, and has historic interest because it contains features which were subsequently adopted in the framework of Pennsylvania. There are forty-four chapters, none of them long. Provision is made for Colonial Commissioners by appointment,¹ but on New-Year's day, March 25, 1680, such commissioners, ten in number, are to be elected by the people—"the proprietors, freeholders and inhabitants resident upon the said province"—and annually thereafter. These commissioners to "govern and order the affairs of the said province, for the good and welfare of the said people," until the election of a "general free assembly." There is to be absolute freedom of conscience; it is declared that "no men, nor number of men, upon earth hath power or authority to rule over men's consciences in religious matters." There is to be trial by jury, and no arrest, attachment, or imprisonment for debt, except after due process before a court of judicature. Trials are to be public, "that justice may not be done in a corner, nor in any covert manner." Conveyances of land are to be recorded. The estates of suicides are not to be forfeited, but to go to their heirs. Care is to be taken for justice to the Indians. Persons found guilty of murder or high treason are to be punished according to the law which the general assembly may provide. This assembly to be chosen on the 1st day of October each year, one member for each of the one hundred "proprietarys" into which the province was to be divided, and to have power to choose the ten commissioners, and to pass laws not repugnant to the constitution now made.

¹The first Commissioners, members of the Burlington Colony, were Thomas Olive, Daniel Wills, John Kinsey, John Penford, Joseph Helmsley, Robert Stacey, Benjamin Scott, Thomas Fulke, and Richard Guy.

John Kinsey died at Shackamaxon, on his arrival, in 1677. His grandson, John Kinsey, was one of the most prominent men in the Pennsylvania Colony for many years—Speaker of the Assembly and Chief Justice.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Each member of the assembly to have one shilling per day, "that thereby he may be known to be the servant of the people."

Earlier even than the preparation of this fundamental law, the English occupancy of the east side of the Delaware had begun. In 1675, John Fenwick, to whom the conveyance by Berkeley had first been made, began the movement. He brought over a company of English colonists, mostly Friends, in the ship Griffith. Ascending the river, they chose a place on the stream now called Salem creek, and named their town Salem. Near by was the site of the Swedish fort, Elfsborg, which the Dutch—and the mosquitoes—had broken up, thirty years before.

Next to that at Salem was the settlement at Burlington. The story of the coming of its first settlers is one of exceptional interest, and has been eloquently told, but it belongs, of course, to the history of New Jersey. The Burlington company, about two hundred and thirty in number, in the ship Kent, left the Thames early in 1677, and reached the Delaware in the middle of August, having touched at New York to exhibit to Gov. Andros their right of settlement. They landed at Raccoon creek, near Salem, and decided, after some hesitation, to go farther up the river, choosing the place called Jegou's island, a part practically of the mainland, and near the island familiar to our narrative as Matineconck. At Jegou's, therefore, they began to build, and Burlington thus became the first place of note upon the Delaware, above New Castle. Philadelphia was yet unthought of, unless by William Penn, and its shore line of primeval forest stood practically unbroken. In the following year, 1678, when the ship Shield, with another party of settlers for Burlington, sailed by the Indian place called Coaquanock, about the center of the present water front of Philadelphia, the vessel came close in, and in tacking her yards reached the branches of the trees that grew by the edge. And then some one on board, unaware what three years would bring forth, but seeing the attractions of the spot, called out, "Here is a fine place for a town!"

Title page of German book to induce Immigration to Pennsylvania

From original in Collection of Historical Society of Pennsylvania

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

The experience gained by his connection with the New Jersey colony, the intense desire of many of the Friends in England for a home where they might live in peace, the report of George Fox that the land was good, and that sent by Josiah Cole and others that the Indians were friendly if well used put into the mind of William Penn the larger plan which he was presently able to execute. Meanwhile, in 1677, he made an extended religious visit to Holland and the Rhine country, which must be mentioned here, for it bore important fruit later. In July of that year, accompanied by George Fox, Robert Barclay, George Keith, and others, he crossed to Holland, and from Amsterdam went to visit the Princess Elizabeth—niece of Charles I., cousin of Charles II. and James II.—at Herford, in Westphalia; thence proceeded to Frankfort-on-the-Main, and its neighborhood, and then passed down the Rhine to Holland again, visiting on the way German towns and cities east of the great river. From the acquaintances and friendships formed on this journey came in no small measure the flood of German migration which colonized an important part of Pennsylvania between 1683 and 1750, and fixed upon it an indelible Teutonic stamp.

The application of William Penn to Charles II. for a grant of land in America was presented early in the year 1680, probably in the month of May. Penn based his petition upon losses his father had sustained in Ireland, in the service of the King, amounting to eleven thousand pounds, with interest, and asked for a tract north of Maryland, bounded east by the Delaware, westward "as Maryland," and northward "as far as plantable." The business thus begun was under consideration for nearly a year. It was transferred to the "Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations," who had been constituted by the King a committee on such matters, and in their hands it remained until the charter was actually drawn and ready for the royal signature.

The several steps may be briefly outlined. The Earl of Sunderland, Secretary of State, June 1, 1680, referred the petition to the Commissioners. June 14, they gave Penn a hearing, learned that he would be satisfied with three degrees northward from Maryland, and ordered copies of his petition sent to Sir John Werden, secretary to the Duke of York, and to the agents of Lord Baltimore. June 25, letters from Sir John Werden and Lord Baltimore's agents were read; the former cautiously discussed the matter, suggesting that the grant as asked for would apparently cover "that colony or plantation . . . held as an appendix . . . of the Government of New York by the name of Delaware Colony," and governed by the Duke's deputies; Lord Baltimore's agents expressed no particular opposition, provided the southern limit of the grant were drawn through "the Susquehanna Fort;" "that fort," they said, "is the boundary of Maryland northward."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Great Seal of the Province of Pennsylvania, 1712—obverse

Penn was called before the Commissioners on the 23d of June, and told he must arrange matters with the Duke of York for an adjustment of "their respective pretensions." He informed them he would be satisfied to take the "Susquehanna Fort" as his southern limit. October 16, a letter from Sir John Werden was received, saying Penn had obtained the approval of the Duke, and the latter commanded him to say that he was "very willing Mr. Penn's request" should "meet with success"—that he should be granted "that tract of land which lies on the north of Great Seal of the Province of Pennsylvania, 1712—reverse

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

Newcastle colony, and on the west side of Delaware river, beginning about the latitude of 40 degrees, and extending northward and westward as far as his Majesty pleaseth."

The way was thus fairly cleared, but many steps remained to be taken. November 4, Penn presented to the Commissioners the draft which he proposed for his patent, and it was referred to the Attorney-General, Sir William Jones; it was also ordered that Lord Baltimore's agents "have a sight" of it. November 11, the Attorney-General presented his "Observations" upon the draft. He had not found, he said, that it would "appear to entrench upon the boundaries of Lord Baltimore's province, nor those of

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

New York, so that the tract of land desired by Mr. Penn seems to be undisposed of by his Majesty; except the imaginary lines of New England patents, which are bounded westwardly by the main ocean, should give them a real, though impracticable right to all those vast territories." In December, North, the Lord Chief Justice, submitted a "settlement of the boundaries" to the revision of Sir John Werden, in the interest of the Duke of York.

January 15 (1680-81), the Commissioners read and approved the boundaries as they had now been drawn, and appointed "Wednesday next, at Nine in the Morning, to review the whole Patent." On the 22d of the same month the minutes of the Commissioners state: "Upon reading the Draught of a patent for Mr. Pen, constituting him absolute proprietary of a Tract of Land in America Northerly of Maryland, The Lords of the Committee desire My Lord Chief Justice North to take the said patent into his consideration and to provide, by fit clauses therein that all Acts of Sovereignty as to peace and Warr be reserved unto the King, and that all Acts of Parliament concerning Trade and Navigation and his Matie's Customs bee duly observed. And in general that the patent bee soe drawn that it may consist with the King's interest and service and give sufficient encouragement to planters to settle under it. A paper being alsoe read wherein my Lord Bishop of London desires that Mr. Pen bee obliged by his patent to admit a Chaplain of his Lord's appointment upon the request of any number of planters, the same is also referred to My Lord Chief Justice North."

February 24, the Commissioners once more read the draft of the Patent, "and there being a blank left for the name," agreed "to leave the nomination of it to the King." "The Lord Bishop of London," the minutes add, "is desired to prepare the draught of a Law to be passed in this Country [the new Colony] for the settling of the Protestant religion."

The patent of William Penn for the region which is now Pennsylvania was thus originated, developed, and perfected. It bears on its face the statement that it was passed, "by Writt of Privy Seale." It was approved by the King on the 4th of March, 1680-81, and the "great seal" was affixed, apparently, the next day. A letter of William Penn to his friend Robert Turner, a merchant of Dublin, afterward extensively engaged in the settlement of Pennsylvania, materially enlarges our knowledge of the transaction:

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

"5th of 1st mo., 1681.

" . . . Thine I have, and for my business here, know that after many waitings, watchings, solicitings, and disputes in council, this day my country was confirmed to me under the great seal of England, with large powers and privileges, by the name of Pennsylvania; a name the King would give it in honor of my father. I chose New Wales, being, as this, a pretty hilly country, but Penn being Welsh for a head, as Penmanmoire in Wales, and Penrith in Cumberland, and Penn in Buckinghamshire, the highest land in England, called this Pennsylvania, which is the high or head woodlands; for I proposed, when the Secretary, a Welshman, refused to have it called New Wales, Sylvania, and they added Penn to it; and although I much opposed it, and went to the King to have it struck out and altered, he said it was past, and would take it upon him; nor would twenty guineas move the under Secretary to vary the name; for I feared lest it should be looked on as a vanity in me, and not as a respect in the King, as it truly was, to my father, whom he often mentions with praise. Thou mayest communicate my grant to Friends, and expect shortly my proposals. It is a clear and just thing, and my God that has given it me through many difficulties will, I believe, bless and make it the seed of a nation. I shall have a tender care to the government, that it be well laid at first."

The charter of Pennsylvania is one of several "proprietary" grants in America by English kings. It gave to William Penn large powers, yet somewhat less complete than those given to Lord Baltimore, by Charles I., in 1632. In the latter grant, laws passed by the Assembly and confirmed by the Proprietary were valid, but in Pennsylvania they required to be submitted to the crown. In the Maryland charter it was provided that the crown, and by inference Parliament, should impose no taxes within the province, but in that of Pennsylvania the right of Parliamentary taxation was expressly reserved. These were limitations, very probably, which Lord Chief Justice North had inserted in pursuance of the minute of the Commissioners to draw the patent so as to guard the royal interests.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The object of William Penn in securing this great grant, perhaps the most valuable which any monarch ever assumed to confer, need cause no extended speculation. Two principal motives impelled him—the desire to found a free commonwealth on liberal and humane principles, and the desire, also, to provide a safe home for the persecuted Friends. We shall be safe if we say that these motives had equal weight in his mind; he was strongly devoted to his religious faith, and warmly attached to those who professed it, but not less was he an idealist in politics, and a generous and hopeful believer in the average goodness of his fellow men. His own statements, many times made, clearly present his views and explain his motives. One of his first acts, on receiving the patent, was to prepare a letter to the settlers who were already in Pennsylvania. It is dated April 8, 1681, and has the special merit of brevity, running as follows:

“My friends—I wish you all happiness, here and hereafter. These are to let you know that it hath pleased God, in his providence, to cast you within my lot and care. It is a business that, though I never undertook before, yet God has given me an understanding of my duty, and an honest mind to do it uprightly. I hope you will not be troubled at your change, and the king’s choice, for you are now fixed at the mercy of no governor that comes to make his fortune great; you shall be governed by laws of your own making, and live a free, and, if you will, a sober and industrious people. I shall not usurp the right of any, or op-

Anne

Queen of England, 1702-1714

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

press his person. God has furnished me with a better resolution, and has given me his grace to keep it. In short, whatever sober and free men can reasonably desire for the security and improvement of their own happiness I shall heartily comply with, and in five months resolve, if it please God, to see you. In the meantime, pray submit to the commands of my deputy, so far as they are consistent with the law, and pay him those dues (that formerly you paid to the order of the governor of New York), for my use and benefit, and so I beseech God to direct you in the way of righteousness, and therein prosper you and your children after you. . . . "

"For the matters of liberty and privilege," he wrote, April 12, to Robert Turner and others, "I propose that which is extraordinary, and to leave myself and successors no power of doing mischief, that the will of one man may not hinder the good of an whole country."

A few weeks later he wrote to James Harrison, and used an expression which has remained conspicuous in the history of his colony. Speaking of the grant by the king, he said: "I eyed the Lord in obtaining it, and more was I drawn inward to look to him, and to owe it to his hand and power than to any other way. I have so obtained it, and desire to keep it that I may not be unworthy of his love, but do that which may answer his kind providence, and serve his truth and people, that an example may be set to the nations. There may be room there, but not here, for such an holy experiment."

The political conditions in England at the time Penn obtained the Charter can hardly be passed over in this connection, though they usually have been ignored in the history of Pennsylvania. It was the period precisely of the struggle of Charles I. with the popular party in Parliament, the "Whigs" as they began to be called, headed by Lord Shaftesbury. This struggle, in which the "Exclusion Act," designed to cut the Duke of York out of the succession to the throne, was for the time the pith and substance, had begun most earnestly in 1679, a few months before Penn presented his petition, and ended in March, 1680-81, less than a month after the charter was granted.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The Catholic religion of the Duke caused the contest. More candid than Charles, who dissembled till his death-bed, James avowed his adhesion to Rome in 1670, and in 1673 took for his second wife a Catholic princess, Mary of Modena. In the same year (1673), the passage of the "Test Act" by Parliament, requiring all holding office to subscribe an oath repugnant to the Roman church, compelled him to resign his place as Lord High Admiral, and in 1679 the heat of the controversy had become so great that he was obliged to quit England. He went first to the Continent and then to Scotland, where he remained, practically in exile, though holding the place of "High Commissioner," until the spring of 1682. He feared impeachment, and Charles did not dare to give him a pardon in advance which would safeguard his remaining in England.

It was thus that Penn plucked the charter of Pennsylvania. When the King went down to Oxford to meet the Parliament, shortly after signing the charter, the old university town, so long identified with the Stuart cause, was occupied with armed men, partisans of both sides, and it seemed as if the fires of another civil war might be kindling. But Charles dissolved the Parliament, after but seven days of life, and Shaftesbury's followers dared not take up the challenge. The King won for the time, and it was left for William of Orange, six years later, to resume the Whig program.

That a commoner like Penn should have received so great a grant amid such heats and complications is a curious passage in history. He was no lover of "prerogative," but an advocate and organizer of popular government; he was no supporter of the Court party, but a friend and associate of men like Algernon Sidney; he was not a Catholic, but a Protestant of a strict sect; he was no loose moralist, to figure in the memoirs of De Grammont, but a man of clean life both by principle and habit.

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

We shall find the reason of his success—not easily won, as his letter to Robert Turner discloses—in a few simple explanations. It was the settled policy of England to strengthen her colonies in America, and for this work Penn had shown large ability in the planting of New Jersey. He was “a born leader of men,” and could call out of England, Wales, and Germany, as a few years proved, tens of thousands of colonists who when they had settled stayed. For the Friends in their persecutions Charles had at least compassion, as his action toward them more than once displayed. The old claims of Admiral Penn, the so-called debt, gave some support, if but slight—for certainly Charles was not one to worry over old debts—to the application. Moreover, the status of the settlements west of the Delaware, north of Lord Baltimore's colony, had been clouded by doubt from the day of Sir Robert Carr's capture of New Amstel, and even earlier, and a royal grant was desirable to clear up the situation.

Seal of Register-General's office

That the Duke of York was the friend of the Penns, father and son, may be here explicitly owned. As James the Second, last of the Stuart line on the English throne, he has passed into history with many severe judgments upon his head. Deserved as all these may be, or some may not, the fact remains that his attachment to the Admiral and to William Penn implied no dishonor either to him or them. The Admiral had been the Duke's supporter and companion for years in the naval wars of England, and on his death-bed he had asked him to remember kindly his son, whose Quaker convictions were only too likely to bring him into trouble. That the Duke continued friendly to the son, as he had been to the father, can certainly be no cause for reproach.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

No time was lost by the new Proprietary. His plans, no doubt, had been thought over and matured in the period of "waitings, watchings, and solicitings." April 2 (1681), he obtained from the King an order to those who were settled within Pennsylvania "to yield all due obedience" to their new Governor. He had already selected his cousin William Markham to be his deputy-governor, and he drew up for him (April 8) a series of instructions relating to the sale of land, etc., and (April 10) gave him his commission, authorizing him to appoint a Council of nine persons, proclaim the King's order, give the letter to the settlers, adjust boundaries with adjoining colonies, establish courts, appoint officers, and in general set the machinery of government in motion. Markham must have left England soon after, for he had landed in America, probably at Boston, and had reached New York, before the 21st of June.

Penn's anticipation that he would himself reach Pennsylvania in five months after the date of his letter to the settlers (April 8), could not be realized. He was detained in England almost a year and a half. The time was occupied with active work for the new province. His pen was busy. He was planning and organizing. He drew up an important pamphlet, "Some Account of the Province of Pennsylvania," which was first published in English, and which Benjamin Furly, a rich merchant of Rotterdam, who had been one of the company with Penn on the Rhenish journey of 1677, spread wide in translations into Dutch, German, and French.¹ It is, in purpose, an advertisement, but in style and content almost a contribution to English literature, presenting many interesting descriptive details, with economic, social, and political observations and suggestions, all in Penn's characteristic manner. He analyzes the condition of the people of England, and explains why they may better themselves in a new country. He describes Pennsylvania, which "lies six hundred miles nearer the sun than England," and whose summer is longer and warmer, but which has, notwithstanding, a colder winter. He classifies the kinds of people, whom "Providence seems to have most fitted for plantations"—"industrious husbandmen and day-laborers," who with the greatest industry are barely able to get on; sundry mechanics, "especially carpenters, masons, smiths, weavers, tailors, tanners, shoemakers, shipwrights, etc.," "ingenious spirits, that being low in the world, are much clogged and oppressed about a livelihood;" "younger brothers of small inheritances;" and lastly, "men of universal spirits, that have an eye to the good of posterity, and that both understand and delight to promote good discipline and just government among a plain and well-intending people." He states his terms for the sale of land. He will sell in "shares" of five thousand acres, free of Indian claims, for a hundred pounds purchase money, and an annual quit-rent of one shilling for each one hundred acres. Renters may have land at a shilling an acre, and for each "servant" taken over, the masters shall be allowed fifty acres, with an equal quantity to the servant when his time is out.

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

¹Benjamin Furly was a notable figure in connection with the early Dutch and German movement to Pennsylvania. He was born in England in 1636, went to Amsterdam, and settled later in Rotterdam, where he married, and became one of the leading merchants. He wrote learnedly, had a collection of "at least 4,000" books, was a linguist, and a student. His house was the gathering place for men of advanced opinions and plans, including John Locke, Algernon Sidney, and the first Lord Shaftesbury. He affiliated with the Friends, and aided and entertained them, but probably did not always regard himself as one of the Society. He died in March, 1714, and was buried in the Groote Kerk at Rotterdam. (See article on B. F., by J. F. Sachse, "Penna. Mag.," Vol. XIX.)

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Two papers of importance for the time in connection with the establishment of the Colony, were prepared later. These were: (1) "Certain Conditions and Concessions agreed upon by William Penn . . . and those who are the adventurers and purchasers in the said Province;" and (2) "The Frame of the Government of the Province of Pennsylvania in America." The first of these papers is dated July 11, 1681, and covers some of the same ground as to sales of land, etc., which had been dealt with in the "Some Account." It may be regarded as a form of contract between Penn and those who were supporting him in his enterprise. It is signed first by Penn himself, and then by thirteen others, few of whom became prominent in the settlement of Pennsylvania.

Home of John Harris, the Indian Trader

Built prior to 1718. Redrawn especially for this work from a photographic reproduction of an oil painting. By courtesy Historical Society of Dauphin County, Pennsylvania.

George I.

King of England, 1714-1727

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

The "Frame of Government" was a more important document. It was not prepared until some time later, and bears date April 25, 1682. It has a preface, signed by Penn, presenting general propositions as to government, followed by twenty-four specific provisions, the spirit of which had already been suggested in the "Concessions and Agreements" of West New Jersey, drawn up six years earlier, and already referred to. There are passages, however, in this first constitution of Pennsylvania, which are of permanent interest, as showing clearly the foundation on which Penn desired the commonwealth should be built, and from which, in fact, inspiration and suggestion have been drawn since his day. These sentences, from the Preface, may be cited:

"Governments rather depend upon men than men upon governments; let men be good and the government cannot be bad; if it be ill they will cure it . . . though good laws do well, good men do better; for good laws may want¹ good men, and be abolished or evaded by ill men; but good men will never want good laws nor suffer ill ones. . . . That, therefore, which makes a good constitution must keep it, viz., men of wisdom and virtue, qualities that, because they descend not with worldly inheritances, must be carefully propagated by a virtuous education of youth. . . . For liberty without obedience is confusion, and obedience without liberty is slavery."

A little later than the "Frame," there was prepared an outline of statutory enactments, "Laws Agreed Upon in England by the Governor and Divers Freemen of the aforesaid Province." There are forty numbered paragraphs under this heading, and the substance of them was enacted by the first and second Assemblies of the Province, which met after Penn's arrival. These "Laws Agreed upon in England" are dated May 3, 1682.

All these papers are, of course, the expression of Penn's own principles and plans. Whoever else may have had a hand in their preparation, by counsel or criticism, the substance of them is characteristically his. Probably no man ever enjoyed more the preparation of such constitutions than did he, and confidently it may be added that no period of his experience with Pennsylvania was happier than this in which he was planning for the future welfare of its people. His expectations were not utopian; his mind was very practical, and he had had enough experience with men to distinguish between the feasible and the visionary in public affairs; so that Pennsylvania in the long run realized in fair degree the hopes he entertained for her, and in every experience of her more than two centuries has never had a better guide or chart than those found in the writings of her Founder. "This is the praise of William Penn," says Bancroft, "that in an age which had seen a popular revolution shipwreck popular liberty among selfish factions, which had seen Hugh Peter and Henry Vane perish by the hangman's cord and the axe; in an age when Sidney nourished the pride of patriotism rather than the sentiment of philanthropy, when Russell stood for the liberties of his order and not for new enfranchisements, when Harrington and Shaftesbury and Locke thought government should rest upon property—he did not despair of humanity, and though all history and experience denied the sovereignty of the people, dared to cherish the noble idea of man's capacity for self-government, and right to it."

¹"Want" is used in the old sense—lack.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

In the midst of his larger plans, matters of business detail pressed for settlement. The Indian trade looked attractive to certain parties, who offered him a large sum for a monopoly of it. Writing to Robert Turner, August 25, 1681, he says: "I did refuse a great temptation last Second-day, which was six thousand pounds, and pay the Indians [i. e., extinguish the Indian claims] for six shares [30,000 acres] and make the purchasers a company, to have wholly to itself the Indian trade from south to north, between the Susquehanna and Delaware rivers, paying me two and a half per cent. acknowledgment or rent; but as the Lord gave it me over all and great opposition . . . I would not . . . defile what came to me clean."

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

The plans which Penn had formed in regard to the sale of land, with the quit-rent feature, are explained in his letter to James Harrison, August 25 (1681), already quoted from. He says:

"Now, dear James, for the fifty acres a servant to the master, and fifty to the servant. This is done for their sakes that can't buy; for I must either be paid by purchase or rent, that is, those that can't buy may take up, if a master of a family, 200 acres at a penny an acre [rent], afterwards 50 acres a head for every man and maid servant, but still at same rent, else none would buy or rent . . . however to encourage poor servants to go and be laborious, I have abated the 1d. to $\frac{1}{2}d.$ per acre, when they are out of their time. . . For those that can't pay their passage, let me know their names, number, and ages; they must pay double rent to those that help them over. But this know that this rent is never to be raised, and they are to enjoy it [possession of the land] forever. For the acre it is the common statute acre by our law allowed. So, dear James, thou mayst let me hear of thee, and how things incline. I shall persuade none; 'tis a good country, with a good conscience it will do well. A ship goes with commissioners suddenly, in five weeks, to lay out the first and best land to the first adventurers. . . I clear the king's and Indian title; the purchaser pays the scrivener and surveyor. I sign the deeds at Thomas Rudyard's¹ when I know who and what."

The commissioners mentioned by Penn, as soon to sail, were William Crispin, John Bezar, and Nathaniel Allen. They received a series of "Instructions" from Penn, dated September 30, 1681, seventeen in number, twelve of which relate to the ¹Thomas Rudyard was a lawyer in London. He was appointed, in September, 1682, deputy-governor of East New Jersey, and came over about the same time as Penn, arriving there in November of that year. He was succeeded by Gawen Lawrie in 1684. For a short time he was Attorney-General of New York. He died in 1692.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

choice of a site for the intended "great town" and its laying out, one of these containing the since famous clause that the houses should stand in the middle of the lots, "that it may be a green country town, which will never be burnt and always be wholesome." William Haige was a little later appointed a fourth commissioner, and Crispin dying on the voyage to Pennsylvania, Captain Thomas Holme was commissioned in his place.

The Commissioners, excepting Holme, sailed late in September or early in October. Several ships were then leaving for Penn's new colony. One of these, the Bristol Factor, Roger Drew master, sailed from Bristol, and arrived at Upland, after a long voyage in December, probably on the 11th of the month. Another, the John and Sarah, Henry Smith master, left London later, but reached the Delaware earlier than the Bristol ship. A third vessel, the Amity, Richard Dimon master, is said to have sailed from London, to have gone by the West Indies—as probably they all did—to have been "blown off" the Delaware capes, and to have put in at Barbadoes, returning thence to England, and not coming to Pennsylvania until the spring of 1682. Whether this, resting upon the authority of Proud, is exactly correct is doubtful. It is certain that the Amity did sail from London on the 23d of April following (1682), reaching the Delaware late in June. If she had made such a previous voyage as has been described, she must have returned, after being "blown off," not merely to the West Indies, but to England.

The commissioners being gone, two other matters of business, both important as it then seemed, pressed on Penn's attention. One of these was the formation of a commercial company, the Free Society of Traders, of which great things were expected, but which in the end brought little but disappointment. Perhaps the letter describing Pennsylvania, which Penn sent to it in 1683, of which we shall speak, was the principal justification for the labor and money bestowed upon the company. The charter, signed by Penn on the last day of the year, March 24 (1681), granted large powers. It was given twenty thousand acres of land, to be a "manor," in the English character, "The Manor of Frank," with manorial powers of holding "court-baron" and "court-leet." Its privileges of trade were extensive, and large plans were formed for its operations. "Two or more general factories" were to be set up, one in Pennsylvania and one on

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

Graeme Park

Situated at Horsham, Montgomery County. Originally a tract of 1200 acres. William Keith erected the mansion in 1722. Photographed especially for this work by J. F. Sachse from original painting in possession of Historical Society of Pennsylvania

Chesapeake bay. An array of officers, agents and employés was provided for. Thoughtful provision was made for receiving "Blacks for Servants." They were to be set free after fourteen years' servitude, but upon condition that they should pay as rent two-thirds of the produce of "such a parcell of land" as the Society should assign them. The Indians, too, were to be assisted, "both by Advice and Artificers," to settle "in Towns and other places."

The corporation was formed March 25, 1681, and the election held in May. Nicholas More, a physician of London, was chosen president, and James Claypoole treasurer. In June, the capital paid in had reached about ten thousand pounds. More proceeded soon to Pennsylvania—in the Geoffrey, a new ship, which came in twenty-nine days, and arrived shortly after the Welcome—and promptly took a leading part in affairs.¹ Claypoole came the next year, in the Concord, with the German settlers from Crefeld.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The other large matter of business which engaged Penn, and detained him in England, was the securing from the Duke of York of a conveyance of his property and governmental rights—whatever the latter might be—of the colony on the west bank of Delaware bay. There was no grant of this, of course, in the charter, and the Duke had been careful to retain the twelve-mile circle around New Castle. Penn thus saw that he might be cut off from the ocean, if the Duke's "Lower Counties" fell into unfriendly hands, and he earnestly pressed him to make them over to him. There is evidence that the Duke was at first disinclined, but he finally consented, and a few days before the Welcome was ready to sail, the transaction was completed. August 2 the Duke executed a release or quit-claim deed to all rights he might have in Pennsylvania, and three days later he executed two "deeds of feoffment," one for the town of New Castle, and the land within a circle drawn twelve miles around it, and the other for all the remainder of the Bay Territory, beginning at the circular line, "and extending south to the Whorekills, otherwise called Cape Henlopen." In each case the Duke appointed John Moll and Ephraim Herman of New Castle his attorneys "to deliver quiet and peaceable possession and seisin." For the New Castle circle Penn was to pay a yearly rent of five shillings, "at the feast of St. Michael the archangel;" for the lands below he ton, Philadelphia. He had a grant of the Manor of Moreland, nearly 10,000 acres, comprising a large part of what became the townships of Moreland, in Philadelphia and Montgomery counties.

¹He was Speaker of the first Assembly (Dec., 1682), and later Chief Justice, then was engaged in a long controversy with the Assembly, and died in 1687, at his home, "Green Spring," near what is now Somer-

The AMERICAN Weekly Mercury,

December 22, 1719.

From the NORTH.

HAMBURG Augst, 20. All Our Letters from Sweden, are full of the Dismal Ravages committed by the Muscovites there. Those Scot Christians have burnt the five Towns of Myddling, Nordkopping, Norib, Telle, Swab, Telle, Asping, Nordkopping, Rustenas, Oriella, &c. with all the Castles and Gentlemens Seats near them & ruined all the Mines, utterly Destroy'd the Copper and Salt Works, burnt the Woods and carried Thousands of the People on Board their Gallies in Order to Transport them into Russia. the Stock, has brought the Company in such an immense Sum in specie, that it is no Wonder it is should be able to pay off the King's Debt of twelve hundred Millions, seeing they are Gainers by that particular Subscription, no less than four hundred and fifty Millions at one Blow in ready Money. and 'tis now said they will still have Leave to advance and enlarge their Subscription for sixty Millions more, and so on to fifty more, if they please, in which Case they may easily pay twelve hundred Millions; and it is said already from Paris, that they have eighteen hundred Millions in Cash now by them, in order to pay the publick Debts, if the People demand their Money, which it is thought no Body would do. They are now, it is talked there, to buy all the

Heading of first Paper published in Pennsylvania

Photographed especially for this work by J. F. Sachse from an original copy was to pay one-half the "rents, issues, and profits," and to hold them "as of the Duke's castle at New York, in free and common socage," paying one rose, if demanded, annually.

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

The labors thus described may be considered to have filled out the busy days of the founder before his ship sailed. He was now a man nearly thirty-seven years old. His home was at Worminghurst, in Sussex, an estate which his wife had inherited. He had three living children—Springett, Letitia, and William. Three other children, born earlier, had died. Looking to his departure he addressed a beautiful letter to his wife and children, which has been ever since the delight of a multitude of sympathetic readers. And before parting he sent a short letter of love to each of the children, a simple missive, in language which their young minds might comprehend. At the end of August he sailed for his new colony.

CHARTER OF THE PROVINCE OF PENNSYLVANIA¹

Charles the Second, by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c., To all to whome these presents shall come Greeting. Whereas our Trustie and well beloved Subject, William Penn, Esquire, sonn and heire of Sir William Penn, deceased, out of a commendable desire to enlarge our English Empire, and promote such usefull comodities as may bee of benefit to us and our Dominions, as alsoe to reduce the Savage Natives by gentle and iust manners to the love of civill Societie and Christian Religion hath humbly besought leave of us to transport an ample colonie unto a certaine Countrey hereinafter described in the parts of America not yet cultivated and planted. And hath likewise humbly besought our Royall majestie to give, grant, and confirme all the said countrey with certaine privileges and Jurisdicons requisite for the good Government and safetie of the said Countrey and Colonie, to him and his heirs forever.

Know Yee, therefore, that wee, favouring the petition and good purpose of the said William Penn, and having regard to the memorie and meritts of his late father, in divers services, and peticulerly to his conduct, courage and discretion under our dearest brother, James, Duke of Yorke, in that signall battell and victorie, fought and obteyned against the Dutch fleete, command-and in Vol. I. of the "Colonial Records." A fac simile of the copy kept in the executive offices at Harrisburg has been issued in connection with "The Duke of York's Book of Laws," and "Pennsylvania Archives," Second Series.

¹So much in the history of Pennsylvania rests upon this grant by the English King that it has been thought proper to print the document in full. It may be found (varying slightly in language from this), in Proud's "History of Pennsylvania," Vol. I.,

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

ed by the Heer Van Opdam, in the yeare One thousand six hundred sixtie-five, in consideration thereof of our special grace, certaine knowledge and meere motion, Have given and granted, and by this our present Charter, for us, our heirs and successors, Doe give and grant unto the said William Penn, his heirs and assigns all that tract or parte of land in America, with all the Islands therein conteyned, as the same is bounded on the East by Delaware River, from twelve miles distance Northwarde of New Castle Towne unto the three and fortieth degree of Northern latitude if the said River doth extend soe farre Northwards; But if the said River shall not extend soe farre Northward, then by the said River soe farr as it doth extend, and from the head of the said River the Easterne bounds are to bee determined by a meridian line to bee drawn from the head of the said River unto the said three and fortieth degree, the said lands to extend Westwards, five degrees in longitude, to bee computed from the said Eastern Bounds, and the said lands to bee bounded on the North, by the beginning of the three and fortieth degree of Northern latitude, and on the south, by a circle drawn at twelve miles distance from New Castle Northwards, and Westwards unto the beginning of the fortieth degree of Northern Latitude; and then by a straight line Westwards, to the limitt of Longitude above mentioned.

Wee Doe also give and grant unto the said William Penn, his heirs and assigns, the free and undisturbed use, and continuance in and passage into and out of all and singular Ports, harbours, Bayes, waters, rivers, Isles and Inletts, belonging unto or leading to and from the Countrey, or Islands aforesaid; and all the soyle, lands, fields, woods, underwoods, mountaines, hills, fenns, Isles, Lakes, Rivers, waters, rivuletts, Bays and Inletts, scituate or being within or belonging unto the Limitts and Bounds aforesaid, together with the fishing of all sortes of fish, whales, sturgeons, and all Royall and other fishes in the sea, bayes, Inletts, waters or Rivers, within the premises, and the fish therein taken, and alsoe all veines, mines and quarries, as well discovered as not discovered, of Gold, Silver, Gemms and pretious Stones, and all other whatsoever, stones, metallis or of any other thing or matter whatsoever, found or to bee found within the Countrey, Isles, or Limitts aforesaid; and him the said William Penn, his heirs and assigns, Wee Doe, by this our Royall Charter, for us, our heirs and successors, make, create and constitute the true and absolute proprietaries of the Countrey aforesaid, and of all other, the premises, saving always to us, our heirs and successors, the faith and allegiance of the said William Penn, his heirs and assigns, and of all other, the proprietaries, tenants and Inhabitants that are, or shall be within the Territories and precincts aforesaid; and saving alsoe unto us; our heirs and Successors, the Sovreignty of the aforesaid Countrey, To Have, hold, possesse and enjoy the said tract of Land, Countrey, Isles, Inletts and other the premises, unto the said William Penn, his heirs and assigns, to the only proper use and behoofe of the said William Penn, his heires and assigns forever. To bee holden of us, our heirs and Successors, Kings of England, as of our Castle of Windsor, in our County of Berks, in free and comon socage by fealty only for all services, and not in Capite or by Knights service, Yeelding and paying therfore to us, our heirs and Successors, two Beaver Skins to bee delivered att our said Castle of Windsor, on the first day of January, in every yeare: and also the fifth parte of all Gold and silver Oare, which shall from time to time happen to be found within the Limitts aforesaid, cleare of all charges.

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

And of our further grace certaine knowledge and meere mocon, wee have thought fit to Erect, and wee doe hereby Erect the aforesaid Country and Islands, into a province and Seigniorie, and doe call itt PENSILVANIA, and soe from henceforth wee will have itt called,

And forasmuch as we have hereby made and ordeyned the aforesaid William Penn, his heires and assignes, the true and absolute Proprietaries of all the Lands and Dominions aforesaid, Know Yee therefore, that wee reposing special trust and confidence in the fidelitie, wisdom, Justice, and provident circumspeccion of the said William Penn, for us, our heires and successors, Doe grant free, full and absolute power, by vertue of these presents to him and his heires, and to his and their Deputies, and Lieutenants, for the good and happy government of the said Countrey, to ordeyne, make, enact and under his and their Seales to publish any Lawes whatsoever, for the raising of money for the publick uses of the said province, or for any other end apperteyning either unto the publick state peace, or safety of the said Countrey, or unto the private utility of perticular persons, according unto their best discretions, by and with the advice, assent and approbacion of the freemen of the said Countrey, or the greater parte of them, or of their Delegates or Deputies, whom for the Enacting of the said Lawes, when, and as often as need shall require. Wee Will, that the said William Penn, and his heires, shall assemble in such sort and forme as to him and them shall seeme best and the same lawes duely to execute unto, and upon all people within the said Countrey and limits thereof;

And Wee doe likewise give and grant unto the said William Penn, and his heires, and to his and their Deputies and Lieutenants, such power and authoritie to appoint and establish any Judges, and Justices, magistrates and officers whatsoever, for what causes soever, for the probates of wills and for the granting of administraction within the precincts aforesaid, and with what power soever, and in such forme as to the said William Penn, or his heires, shall seeme most convenient; Alsoe, to remitt, release, pardon and abolish, whether before Judgement or after, all crimes and offences, whatsoever committed within the said Countrey, against the said Lawes, treason and wilfull and malicious murder onely excepted; and in those cases, to grant reprieves untill our pleasure may bee knowne thereon, and to doe all and every other thing and things which unto the complete establishment of Justice unto Courts and Tribunalls, formes of Judicature and manner of proceedings doe belong, although in these presents expresse mencon bee not made thereof; and by Judges by them delegated to award processe, hold pleas and determine in all the said Courts and Tribunalls, all acons, suits and causes whatsoever, as well criminall as civill, personall, reall and mixt, which Lawes soe as aforesaid to be published, Our pleasure is, and soe Wee enjoyne, require and command shall bee most absolute and avaylable in law, and that all the Liege people and Subjects of us, our heirs and successors, doe observe and keepe the same inviolable in those partes, soe farr as they concerne them, under the paine therein expressed, or to bee expressed. Provided: Nevertheles, that the said Lawes bee consonant to reason, and bee not repugnant or contrarie, but as neere as conveniently may bee agreeable to the Lawes, statutes and rights of this our Kingdome of England, and saving and reserving to us, our heirs and successors, the receiving, hearing and determining of the appeale and appeales, of all or any person or persons, of, in or belonging to the territories aforesaid, or touching any Judgement to bee there made or given.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

And forasmuch as in the Government of soe great a Countrey, sudden accidents doe often happen, whereunto itt will be necessarie to apply a remedie before the freeholders of the said Province, or their Delegates or Deputies can be assembled to the making of Lawes, neither will itt be convenient that instantly upon every such emergent occasion, soe greate a multitude should be called together; Therefore, for the better Government of the said Countrey, Wee Will, and ordeyne, and by these presents for us, our heires and successors, Doe grant unto the said William Penn and his heires, by themselves or by their magistrates and officers, in that behalfe, duely to bee ordeyned as aforesaid, to make and constitute, fitt and wholesome ordinances from time to time within the said Countrey, to bee kept and observed as well for the preservacon of the peace, as for the better government of the people there inhabiting, and publickly to notifie the same, to all persons whome the same doeth or any way may concerne, which ordinances our will and pleasure is, shall be observed inviolably within the said Province, under paines therein to bee expressed, soe as the said ordinances bee consonant to reason and bee not repugnant nor contrary, but soe farre as conveniently may bee agreeable with the Lawes of our Kingdome of England, and soe as the said ordinances be not extended in any sort to bind, charge or take away the right or interest of any person or persons, for or in their life, members, freehold, goods or Chattells; and our further will and pleasure is, that the Lawes for regulating and governing of propertie, within the said Province, as well for the descent and enjoyment of lands, as likewise for the enioyment and succession of goods and Chattells, and likewise as to felonies, shall be and continue the same as they shall bee for the time being, by the general course of the law in our Kingdome of England, untill the said Lawes shall be altered by the said William Penn, his heirs or assignes, and by the freemen of the said Province, their Delegates or Deputies or the greater part of them.

And to the End the said William Penn, or heires, or other, the Planters, Owners or Inhabitants of the said Province, may not att any time hereafter, by misconstrucon of the powers aforesaid, through inadvertencie or designe, depart from that faith and due allegiance which by the Lawes of this our Realme of England, they and all our subjects, in our Dominions and Territories, always owe unto us, our heires and successors, by colour of any extent or largenesse of powers hereby given, or pretended to bee given, or by force or colour of any lawes hereafter to bee made in the said Province, by virtue of any such powers, Our further will and pleasure is, that a transcript or Duplicate of all lawes which shall bee soe as aforesaid, made and published within the said province, shall within five yeares after the making thereof, be transmitted and delivered to the privy Councell, for the time being, of us, our heires and successors; and if any of the said Lawes within the space of six months, after that they shall be soe transmitted and delivered, bee declared by us, our heires and successors, in our or their privy Councill, inconsistent with the sovereignty or lawfull prerogative of us, our heirs or successors, or contrary to the faith and allegiance due by the legal Government of this realme, from the said William Penn, or his heires, or of the Planters and Inhabitants of the said province; and that thereupon any of the said Lawes shall bee adiudged and declared to be void by us, our heirs or successors, under our or their Privy Seale, that then, and from thenceforth such Lawes concerning which such Judgement and declaracon shall be made, shall become voyd, otherwise the said lawes soe transmitted, shall remaine and stand in full force according to the true intent and meaning thereof. Furthermore, that this new Colony may be more happily increased, by the multitude of people resorting thither; Therefore, Wee, for us, our heires and successors, do give and grant by these presents, power, licence and libertie unto all the liege people and subjects, both present and future of us, our heires and successors, excepting those who shall bee especially forbidden, to transport themselves and families unto the said Countrey, with such convenient shipping, as by the laws of this, our kingdome of England, they ought to use with fitting provisions, paying only the customs therefore due, and there to settle themselves, dwell and inhabitt and plant for the public and their own private advantage;

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

And Furthermore, that our subjects may bee the rather encouraged to undertake this expedition with ready and cheerful mindes, Know Yee, that wee of our especial grace, certaine knowledge and meere mocon, Doe give and grant by vertue of these presents, as well unto the said William Penn and his heires, as to all others who shall from time to time repaire unto the said Countrey, with a purpose to inhabitt there, or to trade with the natives of the said Countrey, full license to lade and freight in any Ports, whatsoever of us, our heires and successors, according to the lawes, made or to be made within our kingdome of England, and into the said Countrey, by them, their servants or assigns, to transport all and singular their wares, goods and merchandizes, as likewise, all sorts of graine whatsoever, and all other things whatsoever necessary for food or cloathing, not phibited by the lawes and Statutes of our Kingdomes and Dominions, to be carryed out of the said Kingdomes without any lett or molestacon of us, our heires and successors, or of any the officers of us, our heires and successors, saveing alwayes to us, our heirs and successors, the legall impossitions, customes, and other duties and payments for the said wares and merchandize, by any law or statute due or to be due to us, our heirs and successors.

And Wee Doe further for us, our heires and Successors give and grant unto the said William Penn his heires and assignes, free and absolute power to Divide the said Countrey, and Islands, into Townes, Hundreds and Counties, and to erect and incorporate Townes into Borroughs, and Borroughs into Citties, and to make and constitute ffaires and markets therein, with all other convenient privileges and imunities according to the merits of the inhabitants and the fitnes of the places; & to doe all and every other thing and things touching the premises which to him or them shall seeme requisite, and meet, albeit they be such as of their owne nature might otherwise require a more especiall comandment and warrant, then in these presents is expressed.

Wee Will Alsoe, and by these presents for us, our heires and successors, Wee doe give and grant licence by this charter, unto the said William Penn, his heires and assignes, and to all inhabitants and dwellers in pvince aforesaid, both present, and to come to import or unlade by themselves or their Servants, factors or assigns, all merchandizes and goods whatsoever that shall arise of the fruites and comodities of the said province, either by Land or Sea, into any of the Ports of us, our heires and successors, in our Kingdome of England, and not into any other country whatsoever. And Wee give him full power to dispose of the said goods in the said ports, and if need be, within one yeare next after the unlading of the same, to lade the said merchandizes and goods again into the same or other shippes, and to export the same into any other Countreys, either of our Dominions or flforreigne, according to lawe: Provided alwayes, that they pay such customes and imposicons, subsidies and duties for the same to vs, our heires and successors, as the rest of our subjects of our Kingdome of England, for the time being shall be bound to pay, and doe observe the acts of Navigation and other laws in that behalfe made.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

And Furthermore, of our more ample and especiall grace, certaine knowledge and meere motion, Wee Doe, for us, our heires and successors, Grant unto the said William Penn, his heires and assignes, full and absolute power and authoritie, to make, erect and constitute within the said province, and the Isles and Isletts aforesaid, such and soe many Seaports, harbours, Creeks, Havens, Keyes and other places, for discharge and unlading of goods & merchandize out of the shippes, boates and other vessells, and Ladeing them in such and soe many places, and with such rights, Jurisdiccions, liberties and privileges unto the said ports, belonging as to him or them, shall seeme most expedient, and that all and singular the shippes, boates and other vessells which shall come for merchandize and trade, unto the said pvince, or out of the same shall depart, shall be laden or unladen onely at such ports as shall be erected and constituted by the said William Penn, his heires and assignes, any use, custome of other thing to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, that the said William Penn and his heires, and the Lieutenants and Governors for the time being, shall admitt and receive in and about all such ports, havens, Creeks and Keyes, all officers and their Deputies, who shall from time to time be appointed for that purpose, by the flarmers or Commissioners of our customes, for the time being.

And Wee Doe further appoint and ordaine, and by these presents for us, our heires and successors, Wee Doe grant unto the said William Penn, his heires and assignes that he the said William Penn, his heires and assignes, may from time to time forever, have and enjoy the customes and subsidies in the ports, harbours and other Creeks, and places aforesaid, within the pvince aforesaid, payable or due for merchandizes and wares, there to be laded and unladed, the said customes and subsidies to be reasonably assessed, upon any occasion by themselves, and the people there as aforesaid, to be assembled to whom Wee give power, by these presents for us, our heires and successors, upon just cause, and in a due pporcon, to asseesse and impose the same, saving unto us, our heires and successors, such imposcons and customes as by act of parliament are and shall be appointed; and it is our further will and pleasure, that the said William Penn, his heires and assignes, shall from time to time constitute and appoint an attorney or agent, to reside in or near our City of London, who shall make knowne the place where he shall dwell or may be found, unto the Clerks of Our privy Counsell, for the time being, or one of them, and shall be ready to appeare in any of our Courtts att Westminster, to answer for any misdemeanors that shall be comitted, or by any wilfull default or neglect pmitted by the said William Penn, his heirs or assignes, against our Lawes of Trade or Navigacon, and after it shall be ascertained in any of the our said Courts, what damages Wee or our heires or successors shall have sustained, by such default or neglect, the said William Penn, his heires and assignes, shall pay the same within one yeare after such taxacon and demand thereof, from such attorney, or in case there shall be noe such attorney, by the space of one yeare, or such attorney shall not make payment of such damages, within the space of one yeare, and answer such other forfeitures and penalties within the said time, as by the acts of parlia-

William Keith

Baronet; lieutenant-governor, 1717; established High Court of Chancery which was abolished 1735; issued the first paper money of the colony. Photographed especially for this work by J. F. Sachse from the original in the Historical Society of Pennsylvania

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

ment in England, are or shall be pvided, according to the true intent and meaning of these presents: Then it shall be lawfule for us, our heires and successors, to seize and Resume the government of the said pvince or Countrey, and the same to retaine until payment shall be made thereof. But notwithstanding any such seizure or resumption of the Government, nothing concerning the propriety or ownership of any Lands, Tenements or other hereditaments, or goods, or chattels of any of the adventurers, Planters or owners, other than the respective offenders there shall be any way affected or molested thereby:

Provided alwayes, that our will and pleasure is, that neither the said William Penn, nor his heires, nor any other the inhabitants of the said pvince, shall at any time hereafter haue or maintain any correspondence with any other king, prince or State, or with any of their subjects, who shall then be at warr against us, our heires or successors; Nor shall the said William Penn, or his heires, or any other the inhabitants of the said pvince, make warr or doe any act of hostilitie against any other king, prince or state, or any of their subjects who shall then be in league or amity with us, our heires or successors.

And because in soe remote a Countrey, and scituate neare many Barbarous Nations, the incursions as well of the savages themselves, as of other enemies, pirates and Robbers, may pbably be feared. Therefore, Wee have given and for us, our heires and successors, Doe give power by these presents unto the said William Penn, his heires and assignes, by themselves or their Captaines or other, their officers to levy, muster and traine all sorts of men, of what condicon, or whatsoever borne, in the said pvince of Pennsylvania, for the time being, and to make warr and pursue the enemies and Robbers aforesaid, as well by Sea as by Land, yea, even without the Limits of the said pvince, and by God's assistance to vanquish and take them, and being taken, to put them to death by the law of Warr, or to save them att their pleasure, and to doe all and every other act and thing, which to the charge and office of a Captaine generall of an Army, belongeth or hath accustomed to belong, as fully and freely as any Captaine Generall of an Army, hath ever had the same.

And Furthermore, of our especiall grace and of our certaine knowledg and meere motion, Wee have given and granted, and by these presents for us, our heires and successors, Doe give and grant unto the said William Penn, his heires and assignes, full and absolute power, licence and authoritie, That he the said William Penn, his heires and Assignes, from time to time hereafter forever, att his or their will and pleasure, may assigne, alien, grant, demise or inffcoffe of the premises, soe many, and such partes and parcells to him or them, that shall be willing to purchase the same, as they shall thinke fitt. To Have And To Hold to them, the said person and persons willing to take or purchase, their heires and assignes, in fee simple or ffeetaille, or for the term of life, or lues, or yeares, to be held of the said William Penn, his heires and assignes as of the said Seigniori of Windsor, by such services, customes and rents, as shall seeme fitt to the said William Penn, his heires and assignes, and not immediately of us, our heires and successors, and to the same person or persons, and to all and every of them, Wee Doe give and grant by these presents, for us, our heires and successors, Licence, authoritie and power, that such person or persons may take the premisses or any parcell thereof, of the aforesaid William Penn, his heires or assignes, and the same hold to themselves, their heires and assignes, in what estate of inheritance soever, in fee simple or in ffe tale or otherwise, as to him and said William Penn, his heires and assignes, shall seem expedient. The Statutes made in the parliament of Edward, sonne of King Henry, late King of England, our predecessor, commonly called the Statute Qui Emptores terrarum, lately

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Court House or City Hall, Chester

Oldest public building in the State; erected 1724; still standing. Photo by D. E. Brinton published in our kingdomes of England, in any wise notwithstanding, and by these presents, Wee give and grant licence unto the said William Penn, and his heires, likewise to all and every such person and persons, to whom the said William Penn, or his heires, shall at any time hereafter, grant any estate of inheritance as aforesaid, to erect any parcells of Land within the pvince aforesaid, into mannors, by and with the licence to be first had and obteyned for that purpose under the hand and seale of the said William Penn, or his heires, and in every of the said mannors, to have and to hold a Court Baron, with all things whatsoever, which to a Court Baron do belong; and to have and hold view of frankpledge, for the conservacon of the peace, and the better government of those parties by themselves or their Stewarts, or by the Lords for the time being, of other manners to be deputed when they shall be erected, and in same to use all things belonging to view of frankpledge; and Wee doe further grant licence and authoritie that every such person and persons, who shall erect any such mannor or mannors as aforesaid, shall or may grant all or any parte of his said lands to any person or persons, in fee simple or any other estate of inheritance to be held of the said mannors respectively, soe as noe further tenures shall be created, but that upon all further and other alienacons thereafter, to be made the said lands soe aliened, shall be held of the same Lord and his heires, of whom the alien did then before hold, and by the like rents and services, which were before due and accustomed. And further, our pleasure is and by these presents for us, our heires and successors, Wee doe Covenant and grant to and with the said William Penn, and his heires and assignes, that Wee, our heires and successors, shall att no time hereafter sett or make, or cause to be sett, any imposicon, custome or other taxacon, rate or contribucon whatsoever, in and upon the dwellers and inhabitants of the aforesaid pvince, for their lands, tenements, goods or chattels, within the said province, or in and upon any goods or merchandize within the said pvince, or to be laden or unladen within the ports or harbours of the said pvince, unles the same be with the consent of the pprietary, or chiefe Governor and Assembly, or by act of parliament in England. And our pleasure is, and for us our heires and successors, Wee charge and comand, that this our Declaracon, shall from henceforward be received, and allowed from time to time in all our Courts, and before all the Judges of us, our heires and successors, for a sufficient and lawful discharge, payment and acquittance, commanding all and singular the officers and ministers of us, our heires and successors, and enjoyneing them upon paine of our high displeasure, that they doe not presume att any time to attempt anything to the contrary of the premises, or that they doe in any sort withstand the same, but that they bee att all times aiding and assisting as is fitting unto the said William Penn, and his heires, and to the inhabitants and merchants of the pvince aforesaid, their servants, ministers, ffactors and assignes, in the full use and fruition of the benefitt of this our Charter:

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

And our further pleasure is, And Wee doe hereby, for us, our heires and successors, charge and require that if any of the inhabitants of the said pvince, to the number of Twenty, shall att any time hereafter be desirous, and shall by any writeing or by any person deputed for them, signify such their desire to the Bishop of London, that any preacher or preachers to be approved of by the said Bishop, may be sent unto them for their instrucon, and then such preacher or preachers, shall and may be and reside within the said pvince, without any Deniall or molestacon whatsoever; and if perchance it should happen hereafter, any doubts or questions should arise concerning the true sence & meaning of any word clause or sentence, conteyned in this our present charter, Wee Will ordaine and comand, that att all times and in all things such interpretacon be made thereof, and allowed in any of our courts whatsoever, as shall be adjudged most advantageous and favourable unto the said William Penn, his heires and assignes: Provided alwayes that no interpretacon be admitted thereof, by which the allegiance due unto us, our heires and successors, may suffer any prejudice or diminucon, although expres mencon be not made in these presents, of the true yearly value or certainty of the premisses, or of any parte thereof, or of other gifts and grants made by us, our pgenitors or predecessors, unto the same William Penn, or any Statute, act, ordinance, pvision, pclamacon or restraint heretofore, had made, published, ordained or pvided, or any other thing, cause or matter whatsoever to the contrary thereof, in any wise notwithstanding.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

In Witness whereof Wee have caused these our letters to be made patents, Witness our selfe at Westminster, the fourth day of March, in the three and thirtieth year of our Reigne.

By writt of privy Seale.

PICOTT.

"CONDITIONS AND CONCESSIONS"

First.—That so soon as it pleaseth God that the above said persons arrive there, a quantity of land or Ground plat shall be laid out for a large Town or City in the most convenient place upon the River for health and navigation; and every purchaser and adventurer shall by lot have so much land therein as will answer to the proportion which he hath bought or taken up upon rent. But it is to be noted that the surveyors shall consider what Roads or Highways will be necessary to the Cities, Towns, or through the lands. Great roads from City to City not to contain less than forty feet in breadth shall be first laid out and declared to be for highways before the Dividend of acres be laid out for the purchaser, and the like observation to be had for the streets in the Towns and Cities, that there may be convenient roads and streets preserved not to be encroached upon by any planter or builder that none may build irregularly to the damage of another. . . .

Eighthly.—And for the encouragement of such as are ingenious, and willing to search out Gold and silver mines in this province, it is hereby agreed that they have liberty to bore and dig in any man's property, fully paying the damage done, and in case a Discovery should be made, that the discoverer have one-fifth, the owner of the soil (if not the Discoverer) a Tenth part, the Governor Two Fifths, and the rest to the public Treasury, saving to the king the share reserved by patent.

Ninthly. In every hundred thousand acres, the Governor and Proprietary by lot reserveth Ten to himself, which shall lie but in one place.

Tenthly.—That every man shall be bound to plant or man so much of his share of Land as shall be set out and surveyed, within three years after it is so set out and surveyed, or else it shall be lawfull for new comers to be settled thereupon, paying to them their survey money, and they go up higher for their shares.

Eleventhly.—There shall be no buying and selling, be it with an Indian, or one among another, of any goods to be exported but what shall be performed in public market, when such place shall be set apart or erected, where they shall pass the public Stamp or Mark. If bad ware and prized as good, or deceitful in proportion or weight, to forfeit the value as if good, and full weight and proportion to the public Treasury of the Province, whether it be the merchandize of the Indian or that of the Planters.

¹See full document in "Pennsylvania Archives," Vol. I.

THE FOUNDER OF PENNSYLVANIA

Twelfthly. And forasmuch as it is usual with the planters to over-reach the poor natives of the Country in Trade, by Goods not being good of the kind, or debased with mixtures, with which they are sensibly aggrieved, it is agreed, whatever is sold to the Indians, in consideration of their furs, shall be sold in the market place, and there suffer the test, whether good or bad; if good to pass; if not good, not to be sold for good, that the natives may not be abused nor provoked.

Thirteenthly. That no man shall by any ways or means, in word or deed, affront or wrong any Indian, but he shall incur the same penalty of the law as if he had committed it against his fellow planters; and if any Indian shall abuse, in Word or Deed, any planter of this province, that he shall not be his own Judge upon the Indian, but he shall make his complaint to the Governor of the province, or his Lieutenant or Deputy, or some inferior magistrate near him, who shall, to the utmost of his power, take care with the king of the said Indian, that all reasonable Satisfaction be made to the said injured planter.

Fourteenthly.—That all differences between the Planters and the natives shall also be ended by Twelve men, that is, by Six planters and Six natives, that so we may live friendly together as much as in us lieth, preventing all occasions of Heart burnings and mischief.

Fifteenthly.—That the Indians shall have liberty to do all things relating to improvement of their Ground, and providing sustenance for the families, that any of the planters shall enjoy.

Eighteenthly.—That in clearing the ground, care be taken to leave one acre of trees for every five acres cleared, especially to preserve oak and mulberries, for silk and shipping. . . .

Sealed and delivered in the presence of

WILLIAM PENN.

[Signed also by Humphrey South, Thomas Barker, Samuel Jobson, John Joseph Moore, William Powel, Richard Davies, Griffith Jones, Hugh Lambe, Thomas Farrinborough, John Goodson, William Boelham, Harbert Springett, Thomas Rudyard.]

CHAPTER VII

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY—1681-1700

WHILE Penn had been busy with preparations in England, some progress had been made on the Delaware, under the new charter. We have seen that Lieut.-Gov. Markham reached New York in June (1681.) He found in charge there Captain Anthony Brockholls, deputy governor, Major Andros having gone to England in January to defend his administration of the Duke of York's colonies. Brockholls inspected the documents which Markham brought, acknowledged their validity, and gave him a letter to the settlers within the Pennsylvania limits, notifying them of the grant to Penn, and directing them to yield due submission to the new Proprietary.

This letter has the date of June 21. Just a week earlier the Upland Court had been sitting at Kingesse, and concluding its varied business, judicial and executive, had adjourned to the second Tuesday of September. Appended in its "Record," without date of entry, is found Captain Brockholl's order, and no further proceedings of the Court are recorded. Markham no doubt presented his letter to the justices, and announced to them and the settlers that once more a change of government had been decreed. On the 3d of August he assembled at Upland a Council of nine persons, as Penn had directed. The nine included two Swedes, Otto Ernest Cock and Lasse Cock, and seven of the English settlers, Robert Wade, James Sandilands, Thomas Fairman, Morgan Drewet, William Woodmanson, William Warner, and William Clayton.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

This organization of the Council at Upland, August 3, 1681, may be regarded as the formal beginning of the government of the Colony, now the State of Pennsylvania. Unfortunately no record of its proceedings remains.

A little later, September 13, a new Court, under the new authority, convened at Upland, and resumed the administration of

Ancestral Home of the Lincolns

Built about 1725 by the great-great-grandfather of President Lincoln; it is situated about eight miles south of Reading. From a sketch in possession of D. E. Brinton justice on practically the same lines as the old one. Markham had appointed a larger number of justices; the two Cocks, and two other Swedes, Swan Swanson and Andreas Bankson, with Clayton, Warner, Wade, William Biles, and Robert Lucas, sat at the first Court; while at the next one, in November, Markham was himself present and also Thomas Fairman and James Sandilands. The court was acting evidently for the same territory as its predecessor, the Upland county which had been defined in 1677, and which still included in 1682 all the settlements then made, from Marcus Hook upward to the falls at Trenton.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

In August Markham took up the business of the Maryland boundary line. It is unlikely that he had an adequate idea of its complications and difficulties. He had in charge two letters for Lord Baltimore, one a missive from the King himself, and the other from Penn. Charles advised the Maryland Proprietary of the grant he had made to Penn, and desired him to appoint "with all convenient speed" a person or persons to meet Penn's representatives, and determine the location of their boundary line. After organizing his government, therefore, as the August days were running out, and the malaria of autumn was ready to rise along his way, Markham set off for Maryland, and reaching Lord Baltimore's house on the Patuxent late in the month, presented his two letters. These his Lordship only read, and—according to his own account—assured Markham that proper respect would be given them. But nothing further was accomplished at this time. Markham's ride had been too much for him. "By reason of the great heats," he says, he fell ill—experiencing that fever of the country which the Swedes and Dutch had suffered from—and being taken into Lord Baltimore's house, "continued very dangerously so for the space of three weeks and better."¹ Recovering at last, he returned to Pennsylvania, having arranged with Lord Baltimore for a further meeting on the 16th of October, when they might ascertain the location of the 40th degree of north latitude. Markham agreed also to procure from Colonel Lewis Morris, at New York, "a sextile of six or seven foot radius," to take the necessary observa-

¹The successions in "the peerage," with changes of titular dignitaries, are confusing to the republican mind. This Lord Baltimore in whose house Markham lay, was Charles, the third baron—son of Cecilius, son of George. The following list may make the case plain:

1. George, 1st Baron Baltimore, d. April 15, 1631-2. (The grant of Maryland had been assured him, but he died before receiving it.)

2. Cecilius, 2d Baron, 1st Proprietary. He received the grant, under date June 20, 1632. He died 1675. He never visited Maryland.

3. Charles, 3d Baron, 2d Proprietary. He came to Maryland in 1661, as Governor for his father, was absent between May, 1669, and November, 1670, succeeded to the title 1675, returned to England, June, 1676, came again to Maryland, 1679, and acted as Governor to 1684, when he repaired to tions, Colonel Morris's "being ye only fitt instrument yt could be heard of." But Markham had a tedious passage up the Chesapeake, and wrote on the 25th of September from the "head of the Bay," asking for more time to send to Colonel Morris for the sextile. After he got home he had a return of his fever and ague, and was, he says, "very ill," so that he was obliged to write Lord Baltimore, proposing to postpone the meeting till spring. It happened that his lordship had also written, October 8, saying he "could not come up that year for fear of ye ffrost," and the two letters crossed each other on the way. The business, therefore went over to next year.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

Descriptions of Pennsylvania, as Markham saw it, remain to us in letters sent home by him in December (1681). They are dated at Upland on the 7th of that month. "It is a fine country," he says, "if it were not so overgrown with woods, and very healthy. Here people live to be over 100 years of age." Provisions are "indifferent plentiful, venison especially." He had seen four bucks bought for less than five shillings, the Indians killing them only for their skins, and if the whites would not buy the carcass, letting it "hang and rot on a Tree." Wild fowl were plenty in winter; partridges he was "cloyed with." "In the fall of the leaf, or after harvest, here are abundance of wild turkeys, which are mighty easie to be shot; ducks, mallard, geese, and swans in abundance wild; fish are in great plenty." He found London to press his boundary claims against Penn, and did not again visit Maryland. He d. Feb. 20, 1714-15.

4. Benedict Leonard, 4th Baron, 3d Proprietary. He was nominally Governor, 1684, upon the departure of his father, though W. Hand Browne ("History of Maryland," p. 127), says he was never in Maryland. He survived his father only a few weeks, dying April 5, 1715.

5. Charles, 5th Baron, 4th Proprietary. He was a minor at his father's death. It was he who made, in 1732, the agreement with the sons of William Penn for the running of the boundary line. He came to Maryland in 1736. He died April, 1751.

6. Frederick, 6th Baron, 5th Proprietary. It was he whom Lord Chancellor Hardwick's decision compelled to keep the boundary agreement of 1732. He is called by that ardent Maryland partisan, Prof. Browne ("History of Maryland," p. 217), "a selfish and grasping voluptuary, who cared only for his province, which he never visited, as a source of revenue for his pleasures." His death, in 1771, closed the list of the Maryland Lords Baltimore.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

"abundance of good fruits; all sorts of apples, cherries, pears, good plumbs," with "peaches as good as any in the world, some they feed their hogs with, and some they distill, and make of it a

Isaac Norris
Speaker

Member of Governor's Council, 1708; speaker of the Assembly, 1712; mayor of Philadelphia, 1724; owner of Norristown sort of brandy." Mulberries were abundant; the hogs fed on chestnuts and acorns; grapes grew wild in the woods; "mellons, both mus and water, as good as can be." In fishing sturgeon were so plenty in the river as to break the nets put out for smaller fish

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

—"they leap into the boats very often." "We have," he adds, "very good horses, and the men ride madly on them; they make nothing of riding eighty miles, and when they get to their journey's end turn their horses into a field; they never shoe them."

The ships that are said to have come this autumn to the Delaware have already been named. Whether there were more than two, the John and Sarah and the Bristol Factor, is doubtful. The latter, it is said by Proud, came to Upland on the 11th of December, "where the passengers, seeing some houses, went on shore, at Robert Wade's landing, near the lower side of Chester creek, and the river having froze up that night, the passengers remained all winter."

In the spring the new life of the young colony awoke with vigor. This year, 1682, stands out in the story of Pennsylvania as the time of her heroic and hopeful beginnings. As the river cleared of ice, the three commissioners, Haige, Allen, and Bezar, began their surveys and soundings to determine the location of the "capital city." Holme had not yet arrived, but Markham employed Thomas Fairman, whose house at Shackamaxon, the best probably above Upland, was used as a boarding-place and rendezvous. An account against Penn, rendered him years afterward, and not finally settled until 1713, gives us interesting clues as to this. Its first item, in 1682, is "for taking the courses and the sounding of the channel of the Delaware, seven weeks with Captain Markham, £10," and other items are: "To victuals and drink put on board the shallop at sundry times, £3. To my attendance at first commission with William Hague, Nat. Allen, and John Beazor, no charge. To my taking the courses of Schuylkill, etc., for sounding and placing Philadelphia upon Schuylkill river, etc., £6. To lodging Capt. Markham and William Hague in my house, with diet and liquors for treats, £7."

That the site of the city was chosen without long delay, after the river had cleared of ice, and soundings could be taken—in Fairman's "shallop" probably—seems certain, for word of the place decided on must have reached London by July 14. On that date James Claypoole, not yet ready himself to depart, wrote from that city: "I have 100 acres where our Capitoll City is to be, upon ye River near Schoolkill and Peter Cock's. There I intend to plant and build my house," etc. It does not seem probable that extended consideration would be given to any other place than the one where Philadelphia now stands. Upland had been suggested in Penn's instructions, and it is said Pennsbury was proposed, but the junction of the Schuylkill, the front on two rivers, the bold shore of Coaquanock and the deep channel that flowed before it, must have appealed convincingly to Markham and the commissioners.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Late in June, Thomas Holme arrived in the Amity. He promptly joined the other commissioners and surveyors, assuming the leadership in the work, as Surveyor-General.

Following the selection of the city's site, two other matters of importance engaged Markham's attention before Penn's arrival—treaties with the Indians, and further conferences with Lord Baltimore. The former, in our histories, is usually dealt with briefly. There is in the State archives the record of an Indian purchase made by Markham, on the 15th of July of this year. The native grantors were Idquahon and thirteen other chiefs or "sachemakers," whose names, phonetically spelled, it would be useless to give here, and the land conveyed included all of four townships and parts of three others in the lower end of Bucks county. The line began on the Delaware "at a certain white oak in the land now in the tenure of John Wood, and by him called the Gray Stones, over against the Falls of the Delaware river," upward "to a corner-marked spruce tree, with the letter P, at the foot of a mountain," then "along by the ledge of the mountains to a corner white-oak, marked with the letter P, standing by an Indian path that leads to an Indian town called Playwickey, and near the head of a creek called Towsissink, and from thence went to the creek called Neshamony's creek," down that stream to the Delaware, and then up its bank to John Wood's white oak. The upper corner on the river was near Morrisville, where John Wood was a land-owner; the corner spruce at the foot of the mountain stood on Knowles creek, in Upper Makefield township; the stream Towsissink is a branch of Lahaska creek.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

Markham paid the Indians for this three hundred guilders in money, and a long list of the articles they prized—three hundred and fifty fathoms of wampum, twenty white blankets, twenty fathoms of "stroudwaters," sixty fathoms of "duffields," and scores of kettles, guns, coats, shirts, hoes, axes, saws, drawing knives, barrels of powder, bars of lead, knives, glasses, pairs of shoes, copper boxes, tobacco-tongs, pipes, scissors, combs, awls, fish-hooks, needles, ankers of tobacco, rum, cider, and beer—a formidable list indeed, and such as would have made Printz's heart glad if he had had half as much for the fur trade at Tinicum or Christina, thirty-five years before.

Though we have no earlier record of a purchase by Markham from the Indians, and none before this figures in Pennsylvania history under the Penn rule, it is not clear that there was not a previous purchase. In his account, later, of his controversy with Lord Baltimore, in that year, Markham says that on the 22d of May he received a letter from Baltimore dated May 14, proposing a meeting "ye beginning of ye next month." This, Markham says, conflicted with his business engagements, "ye which at that time was very urgent; for haveing engaged to pay ye Indians for the land I had bought of them, before ye middle of June, in expectation of which they deferr'd their hunting till it was almost too late for that year," etc., etc. This is circumstantial. It plainly seems not to refer to a purchase made so late as July 15, but to one already concluded before the 22d of May—when he received the letter from Lord Baltimore—and for which he was to pay the Indians before June 15.

If there was such an earlier purchase, we may readily presume it to have covered the shore of the river south of the purchase made in July—in fact, the site of Philadelphia. Markham notes in his account that the purchase and the payment to be made for it were highly important, since Penn's plan was to place no settler on unbought land. Had he not, then, made an agreement for Philadelphia before he met the chiefs to buy the Bucks land?

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Logan Arms

Some time after Markham's visit to Maryland, and his illness there, but whether in the autumn of that year (1681) or the following spring is not certain, William Haige, the commissioner—as Lord Baltimore relates—made observations “att the head of the Bay,” and subsequently visited Baltimore at his house on the Patuxent river. There his lordship questioned him closely, asking him "whether he had not taken Some observations at Elk river for his private satisfaction," which Haige, thus pressed, at last "own'd," but said that the instrument he used "was so small there could be no Certainty"—admitting thus that the observations had not pleased him, and indicating that he found the head of the Chesapeake south of the fortieth parallel of latitude.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

Stenton

The Logan homestead near Germantown; built 1727. Photographed especially for this work from canvas in Historical Society of Pennsylvania

May 14 (1682) Lord Baltimore wrote Captain Markham "to signify that he appointed the 10th of June to meet him with persons to settle the bounds." This letter, mentioned above, reached Markham May 22. He was then absorbed in the Indian purchases. The sextile had not come from New York. He wrote, therefore, on the 26th of May, asking a later day for the appointment, and sent it by an express, going himself to New York for the instrument, as it would not be lent unless he personally became security for its safe return. But the Maryland Commissioners would not—at least did not—wait. Riding northward, they halted June 10 at Augustine Herman's, at Bohemia Manor, and took some observations there. Then they came on to New Castle, where they found a sloop from New York lying at the river bank, with Colonel Morris's sextile on board. Markham had sent it around by water, while he rode overland. He had not yet arrived. The commissioners demanded the sextile of Cregier, the Dutch "skipper" of the sloop. He, let us hope, demurred. The audacity of the demand surely cannot be denied.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

And now, while Markham is riding over through the New Jersey woods, and the Maryland men are arguing with Cregier, let us consider more precisely what the Boundary Dispute was. The subject will vex our narrative at intervals for eighty years.

There were two definite causes of difference between William Penn and Lord Baltimore. The first of these related to the proprietorship of the Delaware Colony, called later the "Three Lower Counties," now the State of Delaware. The second related to the location of the northern boundary of Maryland—which would be also the southern line of Pennsylvania. Both of the differences grew primarily out of the obscure wording of Lord Baltimore's grant, and its obscurity arose from the imperfect geographical knowledge of America, in England, in 1632, when the grant was made.

As to the Delaware colony, the first question was whether it was excluded from Lord Baltimore's grant by the clause "hactenus inculta?" Was it an uncultivated region, inhabited only by "savages," when the Maryland charter was drawn? The answer to this is difficult. De Vries had planted a colony there before 1632, but it had been broken up. When Lord Baltimore received his parchment it is unlikely that any white man was living on the west bank of the Delaware. The question, therefore, can be argued either way.

If Lord Baltimore's grant extended to the fortieth parallel of north latitude, wherever that might be, and if the Delaware Colony was not excluded from his grant by the clause "hactenus inculta," then his case was won at both points. But in each particular he fell short. His patent did not say that his grant extended to the fortieth parallel. It said: "and between that boundary on the south unto that part of the bay of Delaware on the north which lieth under the fortieth degree of latitude, where New England is terminated. . . and passing from the said Delaware bay in a right line with the degree aforesaid."

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

This description, it will be seen, is a limited one. It does not extend Maryland to the fortieth parallel unqualifiedly, but to a "part" of Delaware bay lying "under the fortieth degree." This was exasperatingly vague. It happens that no part of Delaware bay is touched by the fortieth parallel. Does the expression "under the fortieth degree" mean the space north of the thirty-ninth parallel? This suggestion was made at one time, in the course of the long dispute. Is the location of the line limited by the necessity of its crossing Delaware bay? That also was insisted upon.

The fact was that when Lord Baltimore received his grant it was supposed that the fortieth parallel crossed Delaware bay near its head, probably about New Castle. The maps of Captain John Smith, the best and perhaps the only ones available in England when that charter was drawn, suggest this, if they do not definitely show it. And when the grant to Penn was drawn up, and it was provided that part of his southern boundary should be "a circle drawn at twelve miles distance from New Castle northward and westward unto the beginning of the fortieth degree of northern latitude," the same impression prevailed. It would have been absurd to employ this description had it then been known or supposed that the fortieth degree lay far more than twelve miles north of New Castle.

As to the condition of the west bank of the Delaware in the year 1632, argument could be made either way, as has already been said. But it was undeniable that from the day of De Vries and Swanendael on down, there had been an almost continuous occupancy by white men, a possession adverse to Lord Baltimore. A government had been definitely established and regularly administered, and except in the demand of Colonel Utie, in 1659, and the lawless raid of his men at the Horekill later, Baltimore had suffered this to exist and grow without serious challenge. To hand the Delaware colony over to him, in 1682, would have been to ignore and reverse the course of half a century.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Lesser Seal of Province

It may be asked here, What did Lord Baltimore mean when he proposed to the Committee of Trade and Plantations, in 1680, that Penn's southern line be drawn at "the Susquehanna Fort?" and what did Penn mean by acceding to that suggestion? It is impossible to say, because we do not know what place either of them had in mind. The palisaded town of the Susquehannocks, we have seen, was probably north of the present line of Pennsylvania, but several witnesses afterward—about 1735—testified in the suit in chancery over the boundary, that there was formerly an Indian fort on the Susquehanna, at the junction of the Cone-wago—the lower stream of that name—in what is now Cecil county, Maryland. Perhaps that "fort" was the one Penn had in mind. A line drawn east and west through it would pass just north of New Castle.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

In the long run there was nothing practicable in a case of such complication but to have a tribunal of competent jurisdiction decree a solution, or for the parties themselves to agree on one. Both of these things finally happened. As to the Delaware Colony the royal privy council decided in 1685, and again in 1709, that Lord Baltimore had not a good claim to it, and as to the boundary between Maryland and Pennsylvania it was settled by agreement of the Penn heirs, and the Lord Baltimore of the time, in 1732, and the Lord Chancellor of England, in 1750, decreed a "specific performance" of the contract thus made—all of which, in due time, this narrative will record. In each instance Penn and his heirs won their whole case. The Lower Counties were awarded him. The southern line of Pennsylvania was run where he would have been satisfied to have it from the very outset of the dispute. Lord Baltimore gained nothing by the long controversy. And indeed, we may remark one thing here: that Pennsylvania was assailed on three sides, south, west, and north, about her boundary; Maryland, Virginia, and Connecticut all beset her; and in every case she won all she claimed. Her neighbors' covetous encroachments came utterly to naught in the end.

Knowing all this, as we now do, after two hundred years, we can regard with composure what Markham then could not, the surrender of the sextile in his absence to the Maryland men, at New Castle. "With some difficulty and many entreaties," they prevailed on the captain, they took the instrument off the sloop, they set it up, and "in a very Clear day, being on the 27th of June, 1682, they found the Latitude of the place of observation, which was in the Towne of New Castle, to be thirty-nine degrees, forty-nine minutes."

Upon this the Commissioners waited no longer for Markham, but rode away homeward. Next day he reached New Castle. To say that he was chagrined and indignant is to describe his state of mind feebly. He says the Commissioners "did by ye means of the Dutch inhabitants of ye Towne procure the Master

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

(he being a Dutch man) to bring it [the sextile] on shoare, and there they used it . . . a Confidence I never mett the like—to dare to touch an Instrument that was to be used by the Contrarie parties, and so privately that no ffriend of ours was by.”

In September the subject was resumed. Lord Baltimore now came himself to Upland with an imposing retinue. Those attending him included Colonel Coursey, Major Seawell, Major Sawyer, four Commissioners, “and forty men Armed with Car-bines, pistolls and Swords!” They rode by way of New Castle, and lodged at Upland the night of the 23d, Lord Baltimore at the hospitable house of Robert Wade, where Markham usually made his home when in the town. The next day, the 24th, was the Sabbath, and Markham was expecting to observe it, considering it not “a day of business,” but the Marylanders insisted upon going on with the observations. An instrument which had been sent over by Penn was at hand, but Markham said that it was not in order for use. The one borrowed from Colonel Morris was therefore procured; it was “brought forth,” Baltimore’s narrative says, “by one Richard Noble, a Quaker, who sett the same up and it being a very clear day observation was taken therewith by the said Noble, as likewise by those Artists the Lord Baltimore had with him, and they all agreed that ye Latitude of Upland was by the Sextile of Coll. Morris in 39 degrees, 47 minutes, and five seconds.” Thereupon Lord Baltimore formally declared that he claimed Upland to be within his grant, and desired “to goe further up the river” to fix the fortieth parallel, “wherever it was to be found.” To this demand Markham refused assent. He produced Penn’s grant, “under the great seale of England,” and showed that it gave him “from twelve miles distance northward of New Castle Towne.” But, said Lord Baltimore, the king could not give this away; his father had already granted it to my ffather. To which Markham replied that it was not for him to presume the king had made a mistake; he was there by the royal authority, and it was his duty to maintain what had been placed in his charge. The discussion degenerated into something of a wrangle. One of the Maryland Commissioners demanded how a twelve-mile circle from New Castle could be drawn to touch the fortieth parallel, and when Markham essayed an explanation, some of them jeeringly remarked, "His Majesty must have long compasses!" To which Markham rejoined that "he hoped they would not limmet his Majesty's Compasses!"

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

The upshot of the meeting was a flat defiance on both sides. Baltimore pressed his demand to go further north, to establish the parallel, and Markham again refused. Then, said Baltimore, give me your refusal in writing, to which Markham agreed. The letter, written later, says: "My Lord, this is my reason, that as I received all yt part of the river Delaware beginning 12 miles above New Castle Towne and so upwards ffrom the Government of New York, which is according to the Express words of his Majesty's Letters Patent to our Proprietary, William Penn Esquire, I most humbly conceive that I am not to be accomptable to any other person than his Majesty or Royall Highness for any part of this Province lying upon Delaware river and soe bounded." He added, verbally, that he "would keep it untill his Master Penn's arrival, which he did not doubt would be very shortly, and desired his lordship would refer all to his Coming."

Lord Baltimore, however, would refer nothing. He set off with his party southward. Taking boat at Upland, he "went to Markiss Hook at Chichester, and there went ffrom house to house, prohibiting the inhabitants to pay any more quitt rents to Mr. Penn, as the land was his, and that he would suddenly returne and take possession of it." Thence he proceeded in his boat to New Castle, and from there rode back to Maryland. He waited, he says, two days at New Castle for Markham to confer further, and Markham, in his "Account," says he would have gone down to see Lord Baltimore, but the members of his Council dissuaded him, urging that nothing useful was likely to result from further conference. Their advice was no doubt good; William Penn was now half way across the Atlantic, and no one was so competent as himself to direct his side of the controversy.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Original Log College Building

In 1721, Rev. William Tennent established a small school at Bensalem; later he moved to Neshaminy and in 1727 had built for college work the log cabin shown. From this beginning has developed Princeton University. The illustration is from the Presbytery of the Log College, by Thomas Murphy, D. D.

The ship in which the Proprietary and Governor was now approaching the Delaware capes is that one which especially represents for Pennsylvania the romance of its colonial beginnings. She was the Welcome, a vessel of about three hundred tons. Her master was Robert Greenaway. She had embarked her passengers, about one hundred in number, at London, late in August, and falling down the Thames, had cleared from the mouth of the river on the last day of the month, and spread her sails for the western world. Penn was of course the chief figure on board, the leader to whom all turned. But we know little of the details of the voyage. Storms they escaped, but not the ravages of disease. The small-pox, scourge of that day and of a century thereafter, until Jenner's great discovery, broke out on board. Men, women and children died, and their bodies were sadly committed to the deep. Four men, John Barber, Thomas Heriott, Isaac Ingram, and William Wade, made their wills on board, and these were proved when the ship arrived from Philadelphia, so that we count them from this evidence as among the dead. Thomas Fitzwater, a member of the Provincial Assembly the next year, lost his wife Mary and two children, Josiah and Mary. Altogether, according to the account of Richard Townsend, of London, one of the company, "about thirty" died. There were births also; two young infants were carried on shore when the ship landed; to Evan Oliver and his wife Jean was added Seaborn, a daughter, born at sea, October 24, "almost within sight of the Capes of the Delaware," and to Richard Townsend and his wife Anne, a son, James, born after the ship had come into Delaware bay. Penn himself escaped the infection of the small-pox, and labored assiduously to comfort and encourage his afflicted companions in the crowded little ship. "His singular care," says Richard Townsend, "was manifested in contributing to the necessities of many who were sick of the small-pox, then on board, out of which company about thirty died." His "good conversation," he adds, "was very advantageous to all the company."

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

The voyage was of about the average length for a ship of that day. Practically two months passed from the departure from the Thames to the arrival at New Castle, but nearly a fortnight of this had been spent in passing around the southern coast of England. In a letter written by Penn after his arrival, he said, "that day six weeks they lost sight of land in England they saw it again in America; and being about twelve leagues off from the coast the air smelled as sweet as a garden new blown."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

On what day the Welcome came inside the capes is not precisely known, but the 24th of October is the date commonly assigned. Penn's letter just cited says—according to Philip Ford's summary: "As they sailed up the river they received visits and invitations from the inhabitants, the people being joyful to see him; both Dutch, Swedes and English coming up to New Castle, they received and entertained him with great expressions of joy after their sort." The records of New Castle County (Delaware) show that October 27 the Welcome came before New Castle town. Penn did not immediately land, but sent a messenger ashore to notify the two commissioners, John Moll and Ephraim Herman, whom the Duke of York, in the deeds of release and feoffment to Penn, had authorized to make delivery of his rights. Herman was absent, but Moll came on board the ship, inspected the deeds, and was satisfied of their significance.

Next day, the 28th, Penn landed. The settlers had been summoned, and had gathered in to look upon this new ruler, the Quaker who claimed authority as against Lord Baltimore. Swedes were there who had seen Printz, if not Minuit, and many, Swedish and Dutch, who remembered Stuyvesant's campaign against Risingh in 1655, and Carr's swoop upon D'Hinoyossa in 1664. By formal ceremony, Moll and Herman now delivered the town and the twelve miles surrounding it to Penn. Going to the little "fort," they handed him the key, "to lock upon himself alone the door, which being opened by him again they did deliver also unto him one turf, with a twig upon it, a porringer with river water and soil." Then the settlers gathered at "the court-house," and Penn "made a speech to the old Magistrates and the people," explaining his plans and assuring all "of their spiritual and temporal rights, liberty of conscience and civil freedoms." All he "prayed, expected, or required" of them, he said, was "sobriety and loving neighborhood."

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

The delivery of the remainder of the Delaware colony, under the other of the two deeds from the Duke, was made to Markham as Penn's representative, by Moll and Herman, on the 7th of the next month, "at the house of Captain Edward Cantwell. at the south side of Appoquinimy Creek."

Leaving New Castle, the Welcome came on up the river. On the following day, the 29th, she lay before Upland. Penn went ashore, and for the first time set foot in his Province. His boat brought him to the beach in front of Robert Wade's house—already well known to us—and the hospitable doors of the mansion swung wide to welcome him.¹ At Upland he remained a day or two. Letters and documents signed by him are dated there on October 29 and on November 1. On the 2d of November he was at New Castle, attending the sitting of the justices.

That Penn changed the name of Upland to Chester soon after his arrival there, and at the suggestion of a passenger on the Welcome named Pearson, has long been an accepted and accredited story. It is, however, very dubious, and probably not true. No such person as Pearson can be identified as a friend or companion of Penn, or as a passenger on the Welcome. It is true that the name of the town was changed, and unquestionably it was done by Penn's order. The time is pretty definitely shown. Penn's letter home, November 1, 1682, refers to the place as Upland, but that of December 16 following contains the phrase, "Chester alias Upland." Confining the change within still narrower bounds, Penn's writ to the sheriffs of the lower counties, convoking the first Assembly, dated November 8, summons the delegates to meet "at Upland," but the certification of the laws, over the signature of Penn, as Governor, December 7, is "Given at ¹Wade's house stood at what is now the northwest corner of Penn and Front streets, in the city of Chester. "It stood, though in ruins, until about 1800." (Martin, "History of Chester.") The exact spot of Penn's landing was marked, in the middle of the 19th century, by a pine-tree, planted under the auspices of John M. Broomall (afterwards Member of Congress), and the Historical Society of Pennsylvania.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The Bartram House

Home of John Bartram; physician; author; founder in 1728 of the first botanical garden in the United States; house built 1731. Photo by J. F. Sachse Chester, alias Upland." The old Swedish name of the town thus ended, and the English one was assumed.

Precisely when Penn proceeded to Philadelphia is uncertain. We have seen that on the 29th of October and the 1st of November he was writing letters at Chester, and on the 2d of November was at the Court at New Castle. Thus he may have visited Philadelphia on October 29 or 30, or on November 3, or a later day. He would have been eager, certainly, to see the "capital city."

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

The traditions have always described him as going up from Chester in an open boat, or barge, and as landing at Philadelphia at the place where Dock creek emptied into the river. This was the "public landing place" of a somewhat later time. On the bank near by was a little tavern, the "Blue Anchor," kept then by William Dare, a "master mariner," and subsequently by George Bartholomew—perhaps also by Alice Guest, and ever since a familiar place in the early history of Philadelphia.

At the beginning of November, 1682, when he stepped upon the bank-side at Philadelphia, William Penn was a little more than thirty-eight years old. He had passed his birthday on the ocean a fortnight before. His feelings, as he reached the site of his city, we may imagine. Its name, if unknown to others, he had himself determined, for in a letter which he addressed two years later to the colonists he uses the expression, "And thou, Philadelphia, the virgin settlement of this province, *named before thou wast born.*¹"

He led the way up the river bank to the little tavern with emotions that may well have moved his large and generous heart. The plans he had evolved, the hopes he had indulged, for this "holy experiment" of Pennsylvania, appeared now to give promise of fruition.

We have seen that the city had been laid out by the Commissioners during the summer, before Penn's arrival. His instructions to them, given nearly a year before, had been in the main followed. But he had conceived his plan of the city on quite too generous a scale. They had found it impossible to lay out the ten thousand acres he had proposed, and had contented themselves with about twelve hundred and eighty. The plotting had been directed by Thomas Holme, and drawings of it, published in London in 1683, and since then many times reproduced, ¹That Philadelphia's name came from the city of Asia Minor, mentioned in the Apocalypse, is most probable. But the meaning of the Greek words forming the name—brotherly love—was very likely to commend it to Penn.—See Note in "Memorial History of Philadelphia," H. M. Jenkins, Vol. I., p. 36.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

show the city extending from the Delaware to the Schuylkill, and from Vine street to South. This was the "old city" or "city proper" of Philadelphia from 1682 to the "consolidation" of 1854, when the municipal limits were extended to cover the whole county. Philadelphia was thus made slightly over two miles long, from east to west, and rather more than one mile from north to south. Half way between the rivers was the Broad street, one hundred feet wide, and where the High street (now Market) crossed this a public square of ten acres was reserved, "at each angle to build houses for public affairs"—"the state-house, the market-house, school-house and chief meeting-house of the Quakers," as Oldmixon, writing twenty-five years later, explained. Four other public squares, "in each quarter of the city," known to us as Washington, Franklin, Logan and Rittenhouse squares, were reserved as well, "to be for the like uses as Moorfields, in London."

Few of the houses of the new city could have been actually built when Penn arrived. Some had been begun. To clear the title to the whole of the city plot arrangements were made with those of the Swedes who had secured grants within it to give those up and take other land. The situation about Philadelphia, as the immigrants who came at the close of the summer (1682) saw it may be learned from the letter of Edward Jones, a Welsh physician¹—a "chirurgion," in the phrase of his day—who arrived in the ship Lyon, John Compton master. This ship had cleared from Liverpool and reached Upland about the middle of August (1682), after a voyage of eleven weeks from land to land, and one more coming up the Delaware. "It was not for want of art, but contrary winds" that the voyage was so

¹Dr. Edward Jones was an interesting figure of the settlement period. He was the son-in-law of Dr. Thomas Wynne, who came in the Welcome with Penn, and who was the Speaker of the Assembly, 1683-4, and later. Edward Jones's daughter Martha married John Cadwalader, and was thus the ancestress of the family of that name; his (Edward's) son, Jonathan Jones, was the father of Owen Jones, who was Provincial Treasurer of Pennsylvania from 1769 to 1776.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

long. The supplies of food held out, however. "We wanted," Edward Jones says, "neither meate, drink, or water. . . . Our ordinary allowance of beer was 3 pints a day for each whole head, and a quart of water, 3 biskedd a day and sometimes more. We have oatmeal to spare, but it is well yt we have it, for here is little or no corn [wheat] till they begin to sow." None died on the voyage, he says, "save one child" and it "of a surfeit."

"We are short of our expectation" he goes on to say, "by reason that the town is not to be builded at Upland, neither would ye master bring us any further, though it is navigable for ships of greater burthen than ours. Ye name of [the] town lots is called Wicaco; here is a crowd of people striving for ye country land, for ye town lot is not divided, and therefore we are forced to take up the country lots. We had much ado to get a grant of it; it costs us 4 or 5 days attendance, besides some score of miles we traveled before we brought it to pass. I hope it will please thee and the rest yt are concerned, for it hath most rare timber, I have not seen the like in all these parts.¹ There is water enough besides; the end of each lot will be on a river as large or larger than the Dye [Dee] at Bala [Wales]. It is to be called Skool Kill. . . . The people generally are Swede. . . . We are amongst the English, which sent us both venison and new milk, and the Indians brought venison to our door for six pence ye quarter. . . . There are stones enough to be had at the falls of the Skool Kill, that is where we are to settle, and water enough for mills, but thou must bring Millstones and ye irons yt belong to it, for Smiths are dear. Iron is about two and thirty, or forty shillings per hundred, steel about 1s. 6d. per pound . . . grindle stones yield good profit here. Ordinary workmen hath 1s. 6d. a day, carpenters 3 or 4 shillings a day. Here are sheep, but dear, about 20 shillings apiece. I cannot understand how they ¹He is describing the tract in the present township of Lower Marion, in Montgomery county; it appears on Thomas Holme's map as that of "Edward Jones and Company, 17 Families."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

can be carried from England. . . . Taylors hath 5s. and 6s. a day. . . . I would have thee bring salt for ye present use; here is coarse salt, sometimes two measures of it for one of wheat, and sometimes very dear. . . . Horse shoes are in no use. . . . Good large shoes are dear; lead in small bars is

Kelso Ferry House opposite Harrisburg

Built 1732; oldest house west of the Susquehanna river now standing. From photo in possession of Historical Society of Dauphin County, Pennsylvania vendible, but guns are cheap enough. . . . They use both hooks and sickles to reap with."

Of the seventy or more passengers, men, women and children, who landed from the Welcome at Upland or at Philadelphia, a few may have found shelter in their own homes. Some months earlier Penn had sent out a pamphlet describing minutely the construction of log houses; one of these, he said, thirty feet by eighteen, might be cut from the woods and made ready for occupancy, in six weeks. Some such huts were probably to be seen in Philadelphia, as winter set in. But most of the newly arrived people must have been taken in by the older settlers, while some, it is probable, found shelter in caves dug in the bank of the Delaware. These caves were a feature of Philadelphia for years afterward. The letter of Penn from Upland, November 1 (as summarized by Philip Ford), says, "The city of Philadelphia is laid out, and many pretty houses are up of late, upon the river and backwards that do very well. An house for W. Penn is a-building." But this description must not be taken too literally. It does appear that Penn lived in a house of his own before the summer of 1683¹ and it is probable that the other "pretty houses," actually in occupancy in the autumn of 1682, were few.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

The cordiality of the old settlers has already been mentioned. We have every reason to suppose that all hopefully and cheerfully welcomed the change of rule. There were now nearly a thousand of the Swedish blood. Penn, in his letter of description a year after his arrival, says: "The Dutch applied themselves to traffic, the Swedes and Friends to Husbandry. . . . The Swedes inhabit the freshes of the River Delaware. There is no need of giving any description of them, who are better known in England than here; but they are a plain, strong, industrious people, yet have made no great progress in the culture or propagation of fruit trees, as if they desired to have enough, rather than plenty for traffic. As they are a people proper and strong of body, so have they fine children, and almost every house full; rare to find one of them without three or four boys, and as many girls; some six, seven, and eight sons. And I must do them the justice to say that I find few young men more sober and industrious."

¹The house that was "a-building" was the little brick dwelling, called the "Letitia House" (from Letitia Penn's subsequent ownership), which stood for two hundred years nearly in the center of the block bounded by Market, Chestnut, Front and Second streets, and was at last (1884) removed to Fairmount Park, where it now stands. It is said to have been the first house in the city that had a cellar.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Giving his time and energy now, first of all, to the affairs of his Colony, the recorded activities of the Governor and Proprietary for the next year and a half are nearly identical with the history of Pennsylvania itself. With little delay, after coming to Philadelphia, inspecting the plans of the city, and ordering some changes—expediting some business whose delays troubled Edward Jones—Penn went to New York to visit Captain Brockholls, the deputy governor there, as an act of respect to the Duke of York and of neighborly civility. He took with him the deeds of the Duke for the Delaware territory, and they were placed on record there, and the acts of Moll and Herman as the Duke's attorneys formally sanctioned by Brockholls and his Council in a proclamation dated November 21.

Returning to Philadelphia the next important work was the holding of the Assembly. Steps for its convening had been taken by Penn before the visit to New York. "We could not safely stay till the spring for a government," he says. Apparently the demand for a code more liberal in some particulars, more strict in others, than "the Duke's Laws," which Col. Nicolls had enacted at Hempstead fifteen years before, and which had been in force until now, was strong among the newly arrived settlers. On November 8 Penn had issued writs to the sheriffs of the three lower counties, directing them "to summon all freeholders" to meet on the 20th of that month, then to elect from among themselves seven persons from each county, "of most note for wisdom, sobriety and integrity," to serve as their deputies in "a General Assembly to be held at Upland, Pennsylvania, December 6 next," and then and there to consult with him "for the common good of the inhabitants of that province, and adjacent counties of New Castle, St. Jones, and Whorekill, alias Deal, under his charge and jurisdiction."

These writs show that Delaware had now formally been divided into three counties. New Castle county remains, but St. Jones was later renamed Kent, and Whorekill or New Deal became Sussex. That the three "original" counties of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, Bucks and Chester, were formed at or about the same time it is fair to presume. We have in the minutes of the first Assembly (December 4) a record of the attendance of Thomas Usher, "sheriff of Chester county." The seals designated for the Pennsylvania counties were: for Philadelphia an anchor, for Chester a plow, for Bucks a tree and vine. The first sheriffs of the three counties were John Test for Philadelphia, Richard Noble for Bucks, and Thomas Usher for Chester.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

We have seen that the writs for Delaware prescribed the election of seven deputies from each county. How those for Pennsylvania ran we do not know. By the "Frame of Government" adopted in England the previous year, "all the freeman" of the Province who saw fit to do so were entitled to attend the first Assembly, and the preface to the "Votes and Proceedings" of that body as printed by Benjamin Franklin seventy years later (1752) refers to this fact. It says: "These Votes begin with the meeting of so many of the Freemen as thought fit to appear, as they had a right to do, by the sixteenth Article of the original Frame of the Government, or Charter, to the end that there might be an universal satisfaction in laying the Fundamentals and establishing the Government and Laws of the Province." It seems unreasonable, however, that the Assembly could have been composed of chosen members, twenty-one in number, from three of the counties, and an unlimited delegation, attending voluntarily, from the other three. For the second Assembly, which met at Philadelphia in March following, one of the Pennsylvania writs has been preserved—that directed by Governor Penn to Sheriff Noble of Bucks—and it is highly probable that the form adopted for the first Assembly was similar. This writ for the March Assembly directs the sheriff "to summon all the freeholders" in his bailiwick to meet on the 20th day of February, "at the Falls upon Delaware River," there to "elect and choose" twelve persons of most note for wisdom and integrity "to serve as their delegates in the provincial council to be held at Philadelphia the 10th day of the First month next" (March, 1682-3, O. S.), and "that thou there declare to the said freemen that they may all personally appear at an Assembly at the place aforesaid, according to the contents of my charter of liberties."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Birthplace of Benjamin West, Swarthmore

Photo by Louise D. Woodbridge

The probable formation of the first Assembly was that those acting were the delegates duly chosen; if others "attended" they took no formal part in the proceedings.

The Assembly convened at Chester on the 4th of December (1682). In what building it sat is a question in dispute. It was long said that it met in the meeting-house of the Friends, but inquiry showed that this was not built until 1693, eleven years later. The little "House of Defence," which had been built under the order of the Upland Court, in 1677, and which was the court-house of Chester county until 1724, is designated by Dr. Smith, in his history of what is now Delaware county. Deborah Logan, in her notes upon the correspondence between William Penn and James Logan, asserts that the meeting-place of the Assembly was the large dwelling-house of James Sandiland, a much-admired mansion in its day, long known as the "double house."

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

We have no complete list of those who were members of this historic first Assembly. If seven deputies were chosen in each of the Pennsylvania counties, as was done in Delaware, making the body number forty-two, altogether, the names of more than half remain unknown. The names we have are these:

The sheriff of Whorekill county, John Vines, in his return, gives the names of the deputies chosen from that county—Edward Southrin, William Clark, Alexander Draper, John Roades, Luke Watson, Nathaniel Walker, and Cornelius Verhoof. Dr. Nicholas More, of Philadelphia, was elected Chairman. Several committees are recorded in the minutes—one on election privileges, one on grievances, one "on foresight for the preparation of provisional bills," and one on an address to the Governor. The names of those serving on these committees are given, and they add to our list the following: Philadelphia, Griffith Jones, Thomas Holme, Thomas Wynne; Bucks, William Yardley, Christopher Taylor; Chester, John Simcock, Thomas Brassey, Ralph Withers; New Castle, John Moll (in place of Abraham Mann, who was unseated for irregularity of election), and William Sample; Kent, Francis Whitwell and John Biggs.

We have thus the names of twenty members, and those of the other twenty-two remain unknown.

The first Assembly sat but four days. It adopted a series of rules for its own procedure, passed an act uniting the three Delaware counties with Pennsylvania, and conferring naturalization on the people, and enacted with some enlargement of scope and language the code of laws which had been "agreed upon in England." On the 17th of December the Assembly adjourned, upon a resolution to meet again in twenty-one days—which, however, it did not do.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Without pausing to remark upon the somewhat quaint though quite pointed and plain rules of procedure, we may particularly speak of the Act of Union and the "Great Law." The incorporation of the "lower counties" with Pennsylvania, under one legislative and executive authority, was an end naturally desired by Penn, and the Delaware deputies, by John Moll and Francis Whitwell, presented a petition asking that it be done. The Assembly passed the act unanimously, and for twenty years, as we shall see, the union subsisted.

As for the "Great Law," or the "Body of Laws," it is a code which, if enforced, would work large and in the main salutary changes in the condition of modern society. It contemplated no compromise with evil doing, and it held as evil many things which after two centuries have come to be regarded as comparatively if not altogether innocent. First and foremost, however, the Great Law provided for those things in which the people were to enjoy liberty. "Whereas," says the preamble, "the glory of Almighty God, and the good of mankind, is the reason and end of government, and therefore government itself is a venerable ordinance of God; and forasmuch as it is principally intended . . . to make and establish such laws as shall best preserve true Christian and civil liberty, in opposition to all unchristian, licentious, and unjust practices, whereby God may have his due, Cæsar his due, and the people their due, from tyranny and oppression of the one side, and insolency and licentiousness of the other, so that the best and firmest foundation may be laid for the present and future happiness of both the governor and people of this province and territories aforesaid and their posterity—be it enacted," etc.

The first enacted section provides for liberty of conscience in matters of religion. "Almighty God," it declares, "being only

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

Lord of conscience, father of lights and spirits, and the author as well as object of all divine knowledge, faith, and worship, who only can enlighten the mind and persuade and convince the understanding of people in due reverence to his sovereignty over the souls of mankind; it is enacted . . . that no person now or at any time hereafter living in this province, who shall confess and acknowledge Almighty God to be the creator, upholder and ruler of the world, and that professeth him or herself obliged in conscience to live peaceably and justly under the civil government, shall in any wise be molested or prejudiced for his or her conscientious persuasion or practice, nor shall he or she be at any time compelled to frequent any religious worship place or ministry whatever, contrary to his or her mind, but shall freely and fully enjoy his or her Christian liberty in that respect, without any interruption or reflection."

The qualification for deputies in the Assembly, for electors for such deputies, and for "all officers and persons commissioned and employed in the service of the government" was somewhat more restricted. Such persons must "profess and declare they believe Jesus Christ to be the son of God, and Saviour of the world." They were to be, moreover, at least twenty-one years old, and "not convicted of ill-fame, or unsober and dishonest conversation"—conduct, as we should now phrase it. And a further clause provided (as the second section of the Laws agreed upon in England had proposed), that all persons should be "freemen" of the Province, with the right of electing or being elected, who (1) had purchased a hundred acres of land, and "seated" it; (2) who had paid passage over, taken up a hundred acres, at a penny an acre, and seated it; (3) who had been a servant or bondsman, had become free, had taken up fifty acres and seated it; and finally (4) "every inhabitant, artificer, or other resident . . . that pays scot and lot to the Governor."

Provision as to morals covered, as has been suggested, a wide scope. Those who derided or abused others on account of their religion were to be "looked upon as disturbers of the peace, and punished accordingly." Labor was to cease on the first day of the week, that all, "whether masters, parents, children, or servants," might read the Scriptures, or attend some place of worship. Swearing by the Divine names or by any other thing or name, speaking loosely or profanely of God, or Jesus Christ, or

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Seal of Bucks County in 1738

"the Scriptures of truth," cursing one's-self or another, or anything belonging to him or any other—all these were offenses punishable by fines or by imprisonment in "the house of correction," at hard labor, with only bread and water for food.

But the penalty of death was limited to malicious and premeditated murder, a leniency of the law then unheard of. In England even trivial thefts were then capital offenses.

The several forms of sexual delinquency were provided against, drunkenness was punishable with fine or imprisonment, and drinking healths so as to lead to "unnecessary and excessive drinking" by a fine. The sale of liquor to the Indians was strongly condemned, and punishment provided. "Whereas," says the law, "divers persons, as English, Dutch, Swedes, etc., have been wont to sell to the Indians rum and brandy and such distilled spirits, though they know the said Indians are not able to govern themselves in the use thereof, but do continuously drink to such excess as makes them sometimes destroy one another, and grievously annoy and disquiet the people of this province, and peradventure those of neighboring governments, whereby they make the poor natives worse and not better, for their coming among them;" it was enacted therefore that persons who should "presume to sell or exchange any rum, or brandy, or any strong liquors, at any time, to any Indian within this province," "should be fined five pounds."

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

An equal fine, or three months imprisonment, was imposed on persons who should give or accept a challenge; twenty shillings fine or ten days of hard labor, on any one who should introduce or frequent "such rude and riotous sports and practices as prizes, stage-plays, masks, revels, bull-baits, cock-fighting, and such like;" and the same penalties upon any one convicted of "playing at cards, dice, lotteries, or such like enticing, vain, and evil sports or games." Any one who should be "clamorous, scolding, or railing with their tongues" should have "three days at hard labor."

Others of the laws provided for the distribution of the property of deceased persons, for the manner of marriages, etc. The civil marriage was made sufficient; there must be consent of parents or guardians, and a publication of intention, and then the marriage must "be solemnized by taking and owning one another as husband and wife before sufficient witnesses," and finally a certificate of it, "under the hands of parties and witnesses," duly registered in the county office. A widower or widow was forbidden to "contract marriage, much less marry," within a year. No "ordinary"—i. e. tavern—could be kept without a license, to be obtained of the governor, and the landlord's charges were fixed. "All strong beer, and ale made of barley malt" was to be sold at not more than two pence a Winchester quart, and "beer made of molasses" at not over one penny. The price of a meal at the inn was to be not more than six pence, and it must "consist of beef or pork, or such like product of the country and small beer." "And of a footman he shall not demand above two pence a night for his bed, and of a horseman nothing, he paying six pence a night for his horse's hay."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The judicial system was simple. It was enacted:

"—to the end that justice may be faithfully and openly done, according to law, that all courts of justice shall be open, and justice shall not be sold, denied, nor delayed; and in every county there shall be one court erected, to which the inhabitants thereof may every month repair for justice, and in case any person shall hold himself aggrieved by the sentence of the said county court, that such persons may appeal to the provincial court, which shall sit quarterly, and consist of not less than five judges, the appellant giving security for the charges of the suit; and no further appeal to be admitted till the appellant deposit in court the sum he is condemned to pay, and give security, in case he be cast by the last jurisdiction, which shall be the provincial council."

And further:

"—that in all courts, all persons, of all persuasions, may freely appear in their own way, and according to their own manner, and there personally plead their own cause themselves, or if unable, by their friends; and the first process shall be the exhibition of the complaint in court, fourteen days before the trial, and that the defendant be prepared for his defence, he or she shall be summoned, no less than ten days before, and a copy of the complaint delivered him or her, at his or her dwelling-house, to answer unto; but before the complaint of any person shall be received, he or she shall solemnly declare in open court, that he or she believes, in his or her conscience, his or her cause is just; and if the party complained against shall, notwithstanding, refuse to appear, the plaintiff shall have judgment against the defendant by default."

Upon the adjournment of the Assembly, Penn went immediately to Maryland, where a meeting with Lord Baltimore had been arranged. He reached Colonel Thomas Taylor's house on West river, on the 11th of December, and on the 12th a conference began, as Penn says, "about our business, the bounds, both at the same table, with our respective members of council." The meeting appears to have been courteous on both sides, and it continued several days, but no result was reached. Penn presented the letter he had brought from the King, directing that the Maryland bounds should be two degrees from south to north, beginning at Watkins Point, and counting sixty miles to a degree, but Lord Baltimore flatly refused to consider such an adjustment. He said the King was greatly mistaken about the matter; "he would not leave his patent to follow the King's letter, nor could a letter void his patent; and by that he would stand. This was the substance of what he said from first to last." Penn pressed him earnestly on the ground of Pennsylvania's need for a good water front. "I told him," he says, "it was not the love or need of the land, but the water—that he abounded in what I wanted, and access and harboring, even to excess." Pennsylvania's case, Penn argued, would justify much greater importunity, for "the thing insisted on was more than ninety-nine times more valuable to me than to him." But the argument and persuasion were in vain; "after three days" the conference broke up, and Penn, after visiting and preaching at the Friends' meetings on the Eastern shore of Maryland, returned to Chester toward the end of December. He wrote from that place on the 29th that he was busy, "casting the country into townships," etc.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

Other ships besides the Welcome had been reaching the Delaware, and unloading their companies of colonists. The Lion, which arrived with the first Welsh company in August, and the Geoffrey, on which Nicholas Moore and others came, a few days after the Welcome, have been mentioned. Penn's letter above referred to (Dec. 29) says twenty-three vessels had come and "none miscarried," but this may refer to the whole year, 1682, or even to the entire period since he obtained his charter. Richard Townsend, one of the Welcome passengers, in his account written twenty years later, says "it was thought near three thousand persons came in, the first year," but this seems an overstatement. The winter appears to have been cold; Penn's letter of the following summer to the Free Society of Traders says: "We had sharp, frosty weather—not foul, thick, black weather, as our northeast winds bring with them in England, but a sky clear as in summer, and the air dry, cold, piercing and hungry.” “Yet,” he adds, “I remember not that I wore more cloaths than in England.” There was, apparently, no scarcity of food. The fisheries in the Delaware provided liberally. Richard Townsend, then at Chester, says he made a net, "and caught great quantities of fish, which supplied ourselves and many others." The chase in the woods did well also; "we could buy a deer for about two shillings, and a large turkey for about one shilling." Indian corn was to be had "for about two shillings and sixpence a bushel"—though this was a high price, relatively, for that day.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Old Hammer and Trowel Inn

Erected 1739 at Toughkenamon; prominent in Bayard Taylor's "Story of Kennett." Photo by D. E. Brinton

The first Assembly had been held because the establishment of a government "could not wait." Writs were now issued for the convening of the second Assembly, to consider further legislation. It was to be held at Philadelphia on the 10th of March, and preliminary thereto the freeholders were to meet in each of the six counties February 20, and choose "out of themselves," twelve delegates to represent them, while they were to be notified also by the sheriffs that they might all personally appear, according to the charter of liberties, if they saw fit.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

The Assembly so convened in Philadelphia, March 10, 1682-3, only the delegates appearing. At the meetings held in the several counties, it had been resolved that this would be sufficient. The Governor and his Council first met, and their proceedings form the first of their minutes, printed in the series of "Colonial Records," published by the State of Pennsylvania. The councillors present at this meeting were only sixteen in number, as follows: Captain William Markham, Edmund Cantwell and John Moll, of New Castle; Francis Whitwell, John Hilliard, and John Richardson, of Kent; William Clark, of Sussex; Thomas Holme, Lasse Cock, and William Haige, of Philadelphia; Christopher Taylor, William Biles and James Harrison, of Bucks; John Symcock, William Clayton, and Ralph Withers, of Chester. The full number of councillors was eighteen—three members from each of the six counties. John Roades and Edward Southrin, colleagues of William Clark, of Sussex, were the two absentees.

Most of these are already familiar to us. Several were old settlers on the Delaware before Penn had his charter—among them Lasse Cock, Edmund Cantwell, William Clayton, John Moll, and William Biles. Christopher Taylor had recently arrived (1682) from England. He took up land in Bucks, but removed to Tinicum Island, in Chester county, about 1684, and was sometime register-general of the province.¹ William Clark was from Sussex, Delaware, a prominent and prosperous man. James ¹Christopher Taylor was a scholar. Before coming over he had taught a classical school at Edmonton, near London, his successor there being the famous George Keith. He was proficient in Latin, Greek and Hebrew, and had published in England, 1679, a "Compendium Trium Linguarum." He left Tinicum Island to his son, Dr. Israel Taylor, who owned and occupied it to his death in 1726,

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Harrison had also recently arrived, and taken up land in Bucks; he was William Penn's first steward at Pennsbury.¹

The Council's minutes may interest us briefly. "The Governor ordered that one speak at a time, standing up, with his face to the chair." It was decided that the ballot should not be used "in all cases," but that it should be "in all personal matters," and that "all bills should be past into the laws by vote." The "charter of liberties"—the "Frame"—was read. It being shown that of the twelve persons elected in each county, three had been designated for members of the Council, and nine to serve in the Assembly, this arrangement was confirmed. It was suggested that this alteration in the "Frame" should not be construed as prejudicing its other clauses, whereupon the Governor assured them "they might amend, alter and add for the Publick good, and that he was ready to settle such Foundations as might be for their happiness and the good of their Posterities, according to the powers vested in him" by his Charter.

The Council met again on the 12th. Meantime it appeared that Dr. Nicholas Moore, who had been the Speaker of the first Assembly, and who occupied what was presumed to be the important position of president of the great corporation, the Free Society of Traders, had been expressing himself in public as violently displeased by the action of the county meetings in reducing the Assembly and the confirmation of this by the Council. The minutes state that he was charged with saying "in company in a public house," to this effect: "They have this day broken the Charter; all that you do will come to nothing; hundreds in England will curse you for what you have done, and their children after but the Master, Settle, took them into the Chesapeake, instead of the Delaware, so that they landed at Choptank, on the Eastern Shore, Oct. 30. Leaving their families and their goods at William Dickinson's, at Choptank, Harrison and Pemberton rode north to Philadelphia, and sent for their families the following spring.

¹James Harrison was of Kendal, in Yorkshire. A letter of Penn's to him, explaining the Pennsylvania plan, has been cited ante. He came in 1682, with his family, including his son-in-law, Phineas Pemberton, the ancestor of a large and notable family of Pennsylvania. They sailed from Liverpool July 7, in the ship Submission,

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

them; you may hereafter be impeached for treason for what you do." Dr. Moore's vehemence in the tavern was the outcome, no doubt, of a temper naturally rather splenetic and overbearing; but it may have been due also to the fact that notwithstanding his prominence in the first Assembly, at Chester, he had now not been elected either to the Council or the Assembly. As we shall see later, he was capable of sustained controversy, and of seeming to enjoy it. The Council summoned him to appear before it, which he did, and on being asked to explain his public oratory said that if he had delivered himself as charged he was certainly to blame, but he had intended to speak "rather by Query than assertion." The Council therefore excused him, but as his discourse had "been unreasonable and imprudent" he was cautioned "to prevent the like for the future."

The fifty-four members of the Assembly, nine from each county, included many who have already become known in this narrative. Philadelphia sent two of the Swedes, Swan Swanson and Andreas Bengston; Chester sent Robert Wade, New Castle Peter Alrich, and three others of the Dutch settlers—Gasparus Herman, John De Haes, and Heinrich Williams. Not less than five of the Welcome's passengers appeared, and one of them, Dr. Thomas Wynne, was chosen Speaker; the others were John Songhurst, of Philadelphia; Nicholas Waln and Thomas Fitzwater, of Bucks, and Dennis Rochford, of Chester.

This second Assembly of Pennsylvania continued its sessions until April 3, and applied itself closely to business. The changes in the number of the Council and Assembly already made were confirmed by an "Act of Settlement," passed March 19, but later it was decided to frame a new "Charter" of fundamental laws, in which this and other subjects should be dealt with, displacing thus the old "Frame of Government" which Penn had promulgated in England. The desire for a new Charter seems to have been felt by the Assembly. On the 20th of March, its members met the Governor and Council. They were asked by the Governor

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

"whether they would have the old charter or a new one," and "they unanimously decided there might be a new one." It was accordingly framed by a joint committee, and it was agreed to engross it anew and entire on parchment. On the afternoon of March 31, "the Speaker came down, with the whole House, to

Boehm's Reformed Church

Blue Bell, Montgomery County; used as a hospital after the battle of Germantown. Negative by D. E. Brinton hear it read," and finally, April 2, the House again "waited upon the Governor and Council at the council-house," when the Charter was once more read, was signed and sealed by Governor Penn, and delivered to Thomas Wynne, the Speaker, who made an acknowledgment of the Governor's kindness in the business. The document was then attested by the signatures of the members of the Council and Assembly, twelve of the former and fifty-three of the latter being present and signing.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

Under this charter the Assembly remained as before in two important particulars: (1) It could not "sit upon its own adjournments," but was summoned and "prorogued" by the Governor; (2) it originated no legislation, but could only pass upon the bills which the Council presented to it. The number of members of the Assembly was fixed at six from each county, and it was arranged that members of the Council serve three years, one member being chosen annually in each county. Bills prepared by the Governor and Council for the Assembly's action were required to be published, by placing them "in the most noted place in every county," twenty days before the Assembly met. The elections for members of the Council and Assembly were fixed annually for the 10th of March, and the convening of the Assembly for the 10th of May.

The legislation passed by the Assembly covered a wide range of subjects. It was enacted that the laws passed at Chester in December should continue in force to the end of the first session of the next General Assembly, except such as might be meantime amended or repealed. A law abolishing primogeniture was passed; it was provided "that whatsoever estate any person hath in this province and territories thereof, at the time of his death, unless it appear that an equal division be made elsewhere, shall be thus disposed of, that is to say, one-third to the wife of the party deceased, one-third to the children equally, and the other third as he pleaseth; and in case his wife be deceased before him two-thirds shall go to the children equally, and the other third disposed of as he shall think fit, his debts being first paid." In the case of a person dying intestate it was provided that it go to his wife, and his child or children; if he left none, then to his brothers and sisters, if any, or to their children; "in case no such be," then one-third to parents, and the other half to next of kin; "and for want of parents one-half shall go to the Governor, and for want of kindred one-half to the public."

Some of the clauses of the "Great Law" were amended, but without impairing its general character. A customs duty was levied on imported "rum, wine, brandy, and strong waters," on cider and on all imported goods, molasses excepted, and the revenue from this was offered the Governor, "as a testimony of regard and affection." Many details of the legislation related to trade. The inspection of "pipe-staves" was provided for, and their export put under regulation. An export duty was placed on hides, beaver skins, deer skins, etc., sent to other countries than England. Liquor exported in any cask or vessel was required to be gauged, and the quantity marked outside. To encourage the flax and hemp culture, it was provided that "such hemp shall be current pay betwixt man and man at four pence per pound, and such flax at eight pence." No provisions coming into the Province or territories, except from West Jersey, should be sold before five days, "to the end that those that live remotely may have notice thereof, and be supplied, as well as those near at hand." Weights and measures were fixed as under the English law, including the "Winchester bushel." The exposure to sale of any wheat at the market price, which was not clean of "dust, chaff, and such like trash," was punishable by a fine. Seven years' quiet possession of land gave a good title, except in the cases of infants, married women, lunatics, and "persons beyond the seas." For three years no cow-calf or ewe-lamb should be killed, except where the dam had died by casualty. For killing a wolf, any person other than an Indian should have ten shillings for a male, and fifteen for a female; if an Indian killed one he should have five shillings, "and the skin for his pains." All sorts of cattle six months old or more were required to be branded with the owner's registered mark, which had to be recorded. The assize of bread was strictly provided for. Wheat fields were required to be enclosed by a fence at least five feet high. Each county was required to erect, before the last day of December, 1683, a house "at least twenty feet square, for restraint, correction, labour, and punishment of all such persons as shall be thereunto committed by law." Persons intending to remove from the Province were required to place a written notice on the "door of the county-court," at least thirty days before, and have a pass "under the county seal." "Unknown persons" were not to "presume to travel or go without the limits" of the county in which they lived without a pass or certificate under the seal of that county. And any person coming from another province into this, without a pass, was liable to apprehension and imprisonment. "Servants" could not be assigned by their owners, except with the cognizance of two justices; such a servant, bound to serve time in Pennsylvania, could not be sold into another province; nor could any servant be attached or taken into execution for the debt of master or mistress.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

The education of the people received thought. The charter provided that:

"The Governor and Provincial Council shall erect and order all publick schools, and encourage and reward the authors of useful sciences and laudable inventions, in the said Province and Territories thereof."

And one of the laws reads:

"And to the end that the poor as well as rich may be instructed in good and commendable learning, which is to be preferred before wealth, all persons in this Province and territories thereof, having children, and all guardians or trustees of orphans, shall cause such to be instructed in reading and writing, so that they may be able to read the Scriptures, and to write, by the time they attain to twelve years of age; and that they may be taught some useful trade or skill, that the poor may work to live, and the rich, if they become poor, may not want: of which every County Court shall take care."

To facilitate travel and communication it was ordained that "sufficient cartways" should be opened to "the most convenient landing-places," and that there should be "ferry-boats for men and horses built within one year . . . over the creeks commonly called Neshamincee, Sculkill, and Cristeen at the charges of the counties they belong to."

With the adjournment of this second Assembly, the Province of Pennsylvania may be considered as having fully begun its career. Its constitutional basis had been deliberately formed by the King's grant of power to Penn, and by the charter which Penn, upon free conference with the Council and the Assembly, had defined and declared. The whole system was thus very democratic. It is true that an ultimate authority, with power to approve or reject, lay in the Crown, but while this might be exercised, and in some cases—as was later unpleasantly realized—be employed to check or thwart the popular purpose, the general operation of the laws was such as the people themselves desired to enjoy. Pennsylvania, from this time, experienced very little of those pains and penalties of arbitrary government which others of the American colonies had to endure. The Assembly especially, from these days of early spring in the year 1683, felt itself the repository of the people's rights and interests, and whatever of criticism or detraction may have been applied to it later, in the ninety years of its life, no one can deny that it sustained throughout the cause of the Commonwealth against all comers. We shall see this abundantly exemplified as we proceed, and shall find the men who successively led the Assembly forming a fine example of single-minded and courageous citizenship.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Paxton Church, Paxtang, built 1740

Photo by Mrs. Innes Henry

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

On the 3rd of April, then, the members left Philadelphia for their homes. Nearly all were farmers, and the labors of the opening season called them to their places. For the men of Sussex and Kent it was quite time to be afield, and even those from Bucks and Chester could make some preparation for the early planting. The weather that year was fine. From March to June, Penn wrote a little later, "we enjoyed a sweet spring—no gusts, but gentle showers and a fine sky." The Governor himself once more essayed to reach conclusions with the Maryland proprietary. This time it was Lord Baltimore's duty to return the visit paid him in December. A messenger had been sent inviting him to name a time and place for meeting, and in May three Maryland gentlemen came riding northward to say that his Lordship expected to arrive presently at the head of Chesapeake Bay. As had happened the year before with Markham, Penn was just then engaged in treaties with the Indians, but he set off as soon as possible, and met Lord Baltimore "ten miles from New Castle." He invited Baltimore to return with him to New Castle, and there "entertained him as well as the town could afford, on so little notice." But the meeting again availed nothing. Lord Baltimore appeared desirous of conferring privately. Penn then proposed that they sit at their several lodgings, each with his council, and interchange "written memorials," so that there might be no mistaking each other's views; but the Maryland proprietary said, "he was not well, and the weather was sultry, so he would return with what speed he could," and leave the treaty to a more convenient time and more pleasant weather. "Thus we parted at that time," says Penn's narrative.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Lord Baltimore had evidently determined to press his claims, and not to negotiate. By an order dated May 15, at St. Mary's, the Maryland capital, he had directed the sheriffs of the several counties to compel all settlers to pay for their land and he fixed the rate within Penn's "Lower Counties" at one-half the amount required in the undisputed Maryland counties. In the latter, for fifty acres the settler should pay one hundred pounds of tobacco down, and two shillings yearly rent, but "on the sea-board side or the Whorekills," he might pay but fifty pounds of tobacco and a shilling rent. Plainly this was to encourage Maryland planters on Penn's Delaware lands.

This order to the sheriffs Penn had heard of before the New Castle meeting, and shortly after that event letters reached him from two judges of the county courts that "such a proclamation was abroad," and the people disturbed by it. Thereupon he sent three members of his Council to Lord Baltimore for an explanation. On their way they secured a copy of the order—probably from Smithson, sheriff of Dorchester county—which they were able thus to show in their interview with his Lordship. He told them, however, that it had no special significance; "it was his ancient form, and he only did it to renew his claim, not that he would encourage any to plant there." Then, said Penn's messengers, if it is merely formal, why not call it in? But this he declined to do.

In the letter to the Lords of Trade and Plantations, August 14 (1683), in which Penn described these events, he says in one place: "I was then (May) in treaty with the kings of the natives for land," and in another place, near the close: "I have followed the Bishop of London's counsel by buying and not taking away the natives' land, with whom I have settled a very kind correspondence." These allusions bring us to the subject of Penn's Treaty with the Indians—the "Great Treaty" of our history.

The time of this treaty was long assigned to the first few days after Penn's arrival at Philadelphia. It was commonly supposed, and has been frequently stated in historical narrative, that the treaty made familiar by Benjamin West's painting, and, hardly less, by Voltaire's allusion to it as "the only treaty never sworn to and never broken," took place in the November days following the Governor's first landing. But this view, upon careful recent study, has been revised. An examination of all the evidence shows it to be altogether unlikely that Penn had any such formal and important meeting with the Indians, if indeed he had any meeting at all with them, before the spring and summer of 1683. His early letters contain no account of it. They make, in fact, little allusion to the Indians. He describes in them his several activities and occupations, but he says nothing of having met the Indians, either for the purchase of land or the negotiation of friendly relations. Moreover, we can account for his movements from the time of his landing until winter with such completeness as to leave few days when he could have held such a treaty.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

The conclusion has been formed, and undoubtedly upon the best evidence, that the Great Treaty of our tradition is that which is referred to in the deed made by Tamanen—Tammany—to Penn, on the 23d of June, 1683, and which will be found of record in the first volume of the "Pennsylvania Archives." In Penn's long and detailed letter of the 16th of August to the Free Society of Traders, he describes the Indians minutely, and then says:

"I have had occasion to be in council with them upon treaties for land, and to adjust the terms of trade. Their order is thus: The King sits in the middle of an half moon, and hath his council, the old and wise, on each hand; behind them or at a little distance, sit the younger fry in the same figure. . . . When the purchase was agreed, great promises passed between us of kindness and good neighborhood, and that the Indians and English must live in love as long as the sun and moon give light; which done, another made a speech to the Indians in the name of all the Sachamakers or Kings, first to tell them what was done; next to charge and command them to love the Christians, and particularly live in peace with me, and the people under my Government; that many Governors had been in the River, but that no Governor had come himself to live and stay here before; and having now such an one that treated them well, they should never do him or his any wrong. At every sentence of which they shouted and said Amen in their way."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Sisters' House and Saal, Ephrata

Erected about 1740. Photo by Louise D. Woodbridge

There is no doubt that the meeting which Penn thus refers to is that of June 23. Nor can it be questioned that he here fairly describes such an occasion as that Great Treaty which is fixed in our tradition. The treaty of June 23 was for the purchase of land, and was a formal and important occasion. Some passages in Penn's description of it, not quoted above, clearly show that previous negotiations had led up to this as a consummation and conclusion. He says of it that: "Having consulted and resolved their business the King ordered one of them to speak to me; he stood up, came to me, and in the name of the King, saluted me; then took me by the hand and told me he was ordered by his king to speak to me; and that now it was not he, but the King that spoke. . . . He first prayed me to excuse them that they had not complied with me the last time; he feared there might be some fault with the interpreter being neither Indian nor English; besides it was the Indian custom to deliberate, and take up much time in council before they resolve, and that if the young people and owners of the land had been as ready as he I had not met with so much delay. Having thus introduced his matter, he fell to the bounds of the land they had agreed to dispose of and the price."

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

In the years following 1683, far down into the next century, the Indians preserved the tradition of an agreement of peace made with Penn, and it was many times recalled in the meetings held with him and his successors. Some of these allusions are very definite. In 1715, for example, an important delegation of the Lenâpé chiefs came to Philadelphia to visit the Governor. Sassoonan—afterward called Allummapees, and for many years the principal chief of his people—was at the head, and Opessah, a Shawnee chief, accompanied him. There was "great ceremony," says the Council record, over the "opening of the calumet." Rattles were shaken, and songs were chanted. Then Sassoonan spoke, offering the calumet to Governor Gookin, who in his speech spoke of "that firm Peace that was settled between William Penn, the founder and chief governor of this country, at his first coming into it," to which Sassoonan replied that they had come "to renew the former bond of friendship; that William Penn had at his first coming made a clear and open road all the way to the Indians, and they desired the same might be kept open and that all obstructions might be removed," etc. In 1720, Governor Keith, writing to the Iroquois chiefs of New York, said: "When Governor Penn first settled this country he made it his first care to cultivate a strict alliance and friendship with all the Indians, and condescended so far as to purchase his lands from them." And in March, 1721-2, the Colonial authorities, sending a message to the Senecas, said: "William Penn made a firm peace and league with the Indians in these parts near forty years ago, which league has often been repeated and never broken."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

It may be concluded from this evidence that Penn had no formal or important meeting with the Indians of the Delaware region—or any others—prior to June, 1683; that on the 23rd of that month he did have such a meeting with them, Tamanen, or Tammany, being one of the chiefs present; that in that meeting purchases of land were made, and declarations of friendship interchanged; and that this occasion is the one which remained long in memory, and has become fixed in history. Even if we did not grant it the distinction of being the Great Treaty it was evidently a treaty of high significance and importance, and so entitled to be called great. The traditional place, beneath the spreading elm at Shackamaxon, on the Delaware's bank, was an appropriate spot, and the tree itself¹ for a century and a quarter remained an object ¹The "Treaty Tree" stood many years afterward, and finally blew down, Watson says (Vol. I, p. 237), on the 3rd of March, 1810. "The root was wrenched and the trunk broken off; it fell on Saturday night, and on Sunday many hundreds of people visited it. In its form it was remarkably wide-spread, but not lofty; its main branch, inclining toward the river, measured 150 feet, and its age, as it was counted by the inspection of its circles of annual growth, was 283 years. The tree, such as it was in 1800, was very accurately drawn by Thomas Birch, and the large engraving executed from it by Seymour gives the true appearance of every visible limb, etc. While it stood the Methodists and Baptists often held their summer meetings under its shade."

A slip from the old tree was planted in the grounds of the Pennsylvania Hospital. The hospital minutes, May 26, 1810, say: "A scion from the root of a tree called the Great Elm of Kensington, said to have been the same tree under which William Penn, the Proprietor of Pennsylvania, held the first treaty with the Indians, was presented by Matthew Vanduzen, and planted by Peter Brown, Esq. . . . The parent tree was blown down in a late storm." This tree at the hospital stood in the way of Clinton street, when it was opened, and was cut down in 1841, but Charles Roberts, one of the managers, planted cuttings from it on the hospital grounds, and one of these, now standing, is a large tree. There are others, from the same original source, in Philadelphia, and one or more elsewhere in Pennsylvania.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

of historic interest and affectionate regard. Benjamin West remembered it to have been pointed out to him, as early as 1755, as the place of the Great Treaty, and he related that General Simcoe, one of the British officers in Philadelphia, in the winter of 1777-78, told him that he had ordered his men not to cut it for fuel, and had placed a guard around it for its protection. West's painting, often criticised as to some of its details, especially as representing Penn older than he really was—a corpulent elderly gentleman, instead of a graceful man under forty—is in the main a consistent and reasonable picture. One point in it deserves especial notice: the trees are shown in full foliage, suggesting not a late autumn or winter day, but one in the leafy month of June, such as that when the treaty with Tammany was held.

The purchase of lands made by Penn, at this meeting on June 23, was in four parcels, and four deeds were made. Tamanen, who made his "mark" to the deed, a snake coiled, conveyed all his lands "lying betwixt Pemmapecka (Pennypack) and Nessamincho (Neshaminy) creeks," and also all lying along the Neshaminy. He received "so much wampum, so many guns, shoes, stockings, looking-glasses, blankets and other goods as he the said William Penn shall please to give unto we." A receipt attached acknowledges the payment of these goods, "besides several guilders in silver." In a second deed, four chiefs, Essepenaïke, Swanpees, and two others, conveyed "all our lands lying between Pemmapecka and Neshaminck creeks, and all along upon Neshaminck creek, and backward of same, and to run two days' journey with an horse up into ye country, as said river doth go." The consideration, as in Tammany's case, was left to Penn's discretion and generosity.

In a third deed Essepenaïke and Swanpees conveyed their interests in precisely the same lands as they had sold jointly with the other chiefs in deed number two.

Finally, in a fourth deed, Tamanen and Metamequan conveyed their lands "lying betwixt and about" Pennypack and Neshaminy, and "along" Neshaminy.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Interior of Saal, Ephrata Cloister

Showing altar table, hour glass, and inscriptions on wall. Photo by J. F. Sachse

All these deeds were witnessed by several white men; the names appended include Lasse Cock, who doubtless acted as interpreter; John Blunston, Joseph Curteis, Philip Th. Lehnmann (Penn's secretary), Peter Cock, Nicholas More, Thomas Holme, and one or two more, with the names of a number of Indians.

Two days later, June 25, another deed was made. The grantee, this time, was Wingebone. He "freely" granted and disposed of all his lands "lying on ye west side of ye Skolkill river, beginning from ye first falls of ye same all along upon ye said river and backward of the ye same, so far as my right goeth." He was to receive "so much wampum and other things" as Penn should be willing to give him.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

July 14, Secane and Icqouquehan, who claimed to be—according to the white men's scrivenership—"Indian Shackmakers and right owners of ye lands lying between Manaiunk, alias Schulkill, and Macopanackhan, alias Chester river," conveyed to Penn all their right and title in the lands lying between these rivers, "beginning on ye west side of Manaiunk, called Consohockhan, and from thence by a westerly line" to Chester river. In this case the consideration was specifically fixed, and may be worth giving in full. The two sachems were to have 150 fathoms of wampum, 14 blankets, 68 yards of "duffels," 28 yards of "stroud-waters," 15 guns, 3 great kettles, 15 small kettles, 16 pairs stockings, 7 pairs shoes, 6 caps, 12 gimlets, 6 drawing-knives, 15 pairs scissors, 15 combs, 5 papers of needles, 10 tobacco-boxes, 32 pounds of powder, 3 papers of beads, 2 papers of red lead, 15 coats, 15 shirts, 15 axes, 15 knives, 30 bars of lead, 18 glasses and 15 hoes, all of which they acknowledged receiving.

It is notable that in this list no brandy or other "strong liquors" appeared. In Markham's purchase, in Bucks county, the previous year, he gave the contracting chiefs six ankers of "rumme," cider and beer. Penn was more scrupulous than his lieutenant, and doubtless realized more strongly the injury done the Indians by drink.

Another deed the same day, July 14, was made by Nenesickan, Malebore, and two others, for lands "betwixt Manaiunk and Pemmapecka, as far as ye hill called Conshohockin, on ye said river Manaiunk, and from thence by a northwest line to ye river of Pemmapecka."

September 10, "Kekelappan, of Opasiskunk" sold "that half" of his lands "betwixt Susquehanna and Delaware, with lieth on ye Susquehanna side," and October 18, Machaloha, who claimed sachemship on "Delaware river, Chesapeake bay, and up to ye Falls of Susquehanna river," conveyed his rights in his land.

To define exactly the extent of these purchases would evidently be impossible. That the neighboring Indians had now been nearly all treated with appears a fair conclusion. If we assume, as has been suggested earlier in this chapter, that the site of Philadelphia had been bought by Markham in a treaty earlier than that (July 15, 1682), whose deed is the first one preserved in our records, we may consider that Penn had very fairly extinguished the Indian claim to southeastern Pennsylvania for twenty to thirty miles around the spot where Independence Hall now stands. That the Indians fully comprehended the effect of their bargain is hardly probable. That they were more kindly dealt with than had been usual when the white man came to take the red man's land is beyond reasonable dispute.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The importance of acquiring consent of the Indians to his possession of the interior country, as well as that around Philadelphia, appeared plain to Penn's mind, and in the summer (1683) he sent agents to confer with the Iroquois chiefs of New York. Their overlordship of the tribes on the Susquehanna was evidently known to him, and their conquest of the Susquehannocks' "fort" was an event so recent as to be common knowledge among the colonists. A letter remains, written by Penn in July, 1683, to Acting Governor Brockholls of New York, commending to his favor two agents whom Penn is sending to treat with the sachems of the Mohawks and Senecas and their allied tribes for a release of the Susquehanna lands. Their business, Penn wrote to Brockholls, "is to treat . . . about some Susquehanash land on ye back of us, where I intend a colony forthwith, a place so out of the way that a small thing could not carry some people to it."

The two agents thus sent were William Haige, the Pennsylvania surveyor, already frequently mentioned, and James Graham, a resident of New York, an alderman of that city, afterward attorney-general. They appear to have gone to Albany in August, and their proceedings there caused great alarm, as we shall see.

A new governor at this juncture reached New York, displacing Brockholls. He was Colonel Thomas Dongan. He arrived on the 25th of August, having come over from Boston, where—at Nantasket—his ship had made port. Dongan is of interest to our study of Pennsylvania history, for in his service as Governor of the adjoining province from August, 1683, to August 1688, he touched at many points the life of this colony. He was the younger son of an Irish baronet, Sir John Dongan, and a nephew of the celebrated Richard Talbot, who became Earl and Duke of Tyrconnel. Born in 1634, he became a colonel in the royal army after the Restoration of Charles II., served in France, and was lieutenant-governor at Tangier in Africa. He was a Roman Catholic, like his patron the Duke of York, and an enterprising, active and intelligent man. His acquaintance with the French and their language helped to qualify him to manage the delicate relations of New York with Canada and the Iroquois Indians.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

Charged by his instructions to be careful of the interests of the Duke of York, the new Governor heard of the negotiations of Penn's agents with concern, and directed the Albany justices to report to him on the matter. They were themselves stricken with panic. They feared that Penn would plant a strong settlement on the Susquehanna—a thing which in fact was not yet possible, nor to be so for half a century—and that the Iroquois Indians, instead of bringing their furs to the Hudson, would send them southward. An "extraordinary meeting" of the justices was called September 7. Five assembled. They had before them such of the chiefs as could be hastily brought in—two of the Cayugas, and "a Susquehanna." The Indians were questioned closely as to the "situation of Susquehanna river," and its geographical and trade relations with the New York settlements, especially that at Albany. The information elicited and minuted is still of interest. The Indians said it was "one day's journey from the Mohawk castles to the lake where the Susquehanna river rises, and then ten days' journey to the Susquehanna castles." It was one and a half days' journey by land from Oneida "to the kill which falls into Susquehanna river," and one day thence to the river itself. It was half a day by land, and one day by water from Onondaga to the river. From Cayuga it was one and a half days' by land and water to the river. From the "four castles" of the Senecas it was three days' journey by land and two by water to the river, and then five days by water to the Susquehanna

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Old Trappe Church

Erected 1743 near Schwenksville; occupied in the fall of 1777 by a portion of the army under General Armstrong. Photo by D. E. Brinton castles, making ten in all, and this trip was "very easy, they conveying their packs in canoes."

These close questions being asked, the chiefs inquired not unnaturally the reason for such inquisition. Why did the justices want to know? Were the white men coming to Susquehanna? They were asked in turn how that would suit them, and candidly said very well. It would be much easier and nearer for trade than Albany offered, "insomuch as they must bring everything thither on their backs." This was a most alarming statement! The fur trade of the Iroquois was the source of Albany's importance. The justices closed the meeting and wrote hastily to the Governor, urging him to find "an expedient for preventing" the acquisition by Penn of a Susquehanna Indian title. A little later, September 18, Dongan advised them that he had conferred with his Council and that it was thought "very convenient and necessary to putt a stopp to all proceedings in Mr. Penn's affairs with the Indians until his bounds and limits be adjusted." They were therefore instructed "to suffer no manner of proceedings in that business," until they should be further advised.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

The business was thus halted for the time. The Indian chiefs were persuaded to say to Haige that they had no right to sell the lands, having promised them to "Corlaer"—their generic name for the New York governors—on some previous occasion, and to refuse therefore to go on with the negotiations. Then Dongan, to fix the business securely in his own hands, procured from some of the chiefs a grant of the lands to himself. Precisely what value he attached to this, and exactly how he considered his actions would look to the Duke of York and to Penn, may be a question, but he wrote to the latter (October 10) avowing his purchase, and again (October 22) saying it had further been confirmed by the Indians and that he and Penn would not "fall out" over it.

And here the account may as well be completed, though we shall go somewhat further in the order of time than our present narrative demands. In 1696, Dongan, who described himself as then "of London," executed a "lease and release" to William Penn of "all that tract of land lying upon, on both sides, the river commonly called or known by the name of the Susquehanna river, and the lands adjacent, beginning at the mountains or head of the said river, and running as far as and unto the Bay of Chesapeak," it being the same "which the said Thomas Dongan lately purchased of or had given him by the Sinneca Susquehanah Indians." This conveyance cost Penn, on the face of the release, a hundred pounds, but the expense may have been greater. It gave him, at any rate, whatever Indian title to the Susquehanna Dongan had procured in 1683. In a treaty made in 1700, at Pennsbury, with two chiefs of the Susquehanna region—whose names, Widaagh and Andaggy-Junkquah, signify nothing to us—they granted to Penn all the rights they possessed on the river, and “ratified and confirmed” the deed of Dongan.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

These proceedings between 1683 and 1700, in reference to the Susquehanna, caused other perturbations at New York than those we have recited. A petition forwarded from that city in 1691 by the Provincial Council to King William III. earnestly represented the importance of dispossessing Penn altogether. The petition was signed by Richard Ingoldsby, Frederick Phillips, Stephen Courtland, Nicholas Bayard, and others. The Susquehanna, they said, “is situate in the middle of the Sinnekes country,” and was given to the crown “many years before Mr. Penn had his patent.” He, however, was now endeavoring to buy it of the Indians, in order to draw away the trade to his province, and the Council assured the King that this would do him great damage. “All the nations with whom Albany hath a trade live at the head of Susquehanna river,” they said, and declared that “the inhabitants at Albany” had “only seated themselves there, and addicted their minds to the Indian language and the mysteries of the said trade, with purpose to manage it.” They strongly urged that if Penn should have his title to Pennsylvania confirmed, it should extend no further on the Susquehanna “than the falls thereof,” but they much preferred that Connecticut, East and West Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the “Three Lower Counties” on the Delaware should be re-annexed to New York, which they were of opinion “would then be a government of sufficient extent”—for what or whom they did not explain.

Even this representation, however, did not avail—at least not permanently. Its date, August 6, 1691, coincides with the time when efforts began to be vigorously made to dispossess Penn, these finally resulting in the Fletcher episode, 1693 to 1695, when for the first time and last time a “royal” governor had authority in Pennsylvania. The envy and hostility, growing into malevolence, of the official influences in other colonies, at many times, toward this province and its rulers, were as discreditable as they were unjustifiable. Penn himself was a shining mark for those who disliked his religious views, dreaded his democratic system, or despised his humane policy, or hated all of these.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

We return, now, to the summer of 1683, and to such events as have not been related. The letters of Penn to his correspondents in England give details of the progress of the colony. He wrote in July to Colonel Henry Sydney, afterwards Earl of Romney, and brother of Algernon Sydney. He had been here, he said, about five months, and had had his health; he found the country wholesome, and the land, air, and water all good. "We have laid out a town a mile long and two miles deep. On each side of the town runs a navigable river, the least as broad as the Thames at Woolwich, the other about a mile over. I think we have near about eighty houses built, and about three hundred farms settled round the town. I fancy it already better than the Weald of Kent, our soil being clearer, and the country not much closer; a coach might be driven twenty miles end-ways. We have had fifty sail of ships and small vessels since the last summer, in our river, which shows a good beginning." Writing to the Lord Chief Justice, North, the same date, he says, "a fair we have had, and weekly market to which the ancient lowly inhabitants"—the Swedes and Dutch, doubtless—"come to sell their produce, to their profit, and our accommodation." Later, July 28, he writes the Earl of Sunderland, describing the Indians, alluding especially to the injury done them by drink. Though, he says, "many of the old men and some of ye young people will not touch it," yet "because in those fits they mischief both themselves and others, I have forbid to sell them any."

The minutes of the Provincial Council record the developing life of the colony. Meetings of the Council were held frequently. During the sittings of the Assembly it met daily, and after the ad-

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

jourment of the spring Assembly (April 3), nearly forty meetings were held during the year 1683. At all of these Governor Penn was present and presiding. Of the eighteen members of the Council as many as twelve attended a few times, but usually not more than half that number. The business dealt with was, as already has been said, both executive and judicial, and, in conjunction with the Assembly, legislative also. There were appeals from the county courts. In one instance the justices of Philadelphia county had presumed to pass upon a case belonging in Bucks, and the Council imposed a fine upon them of forty pounds. The passengers on a vessel arrived in the river preferred charges against the master for abuse, and taking their private supply of water and beer. "The Governor gave the master a reprimand, and advised him to go with the passengers, and make up the business, which he did." Three men were tried for making silver coins, "Spanish bits and Boston money." The coins looked well, and were gladly accepted as currency, but the makers admitted that they contained too much alloy of copper. The grand jury that passed upon the indictment in this case was the first in Pennsylvania, and so was the trial jury which heard the testimony. In the lists of the two are names of some of the most prominent early settlers—Thomas Lloyd, afterward lieutenant-governor; Enoch Flower, teacher of the first school in Philadelphia; Nicholas Waln, John Blunston, Thomas Fitzwater, John Claypoole, Robert Turner, Andrew Bengston, Dennis Rochford, and others. All the accused were convicted, and Pickering, the principal, was sentenced by the Governor to replace his over-alloyed coins with good money, to pay a fine of forty pounds "toward ye building of a new court-house in this Towne," and to give security for his future "good abearance." The other two were less severely dealt with; one was fined ten pounds for the court-house fund, and the other sentenced to "sitt an hour in the stocks to-morrow morning."

A ship called the Mary of Southampton, which had come into port with passengers from England, was seized, November 21, by

Thomas Penn

Member of the Council, 1732; and after the Fort Stanwix treaty, 1768; feudal lord of more than 25,000,000 acres and the inhabitants thereon. Photographed especially for this work by J. F. Sachse from canvas in Historical Society of Pennsylvania the Council, it being found that she was sailing under a false name, being in reality a "Scottish bottom," the Alexander, of Inverness, "noe ways made free to trade with any of his Majesty's plantations in America," according to the provisions of the Act of Parliament. The ship was publicly condemned, and perhaps sold; the canny but too venturesome Scotch master had to learn that the trade of the American colonies was intended for the benefit of English merchants by the carefully devised system of the Navigation laws.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

A certain Anthony Weston was sharply dealt with, also. He seems to have circulated some kind of a "paper" or "proposal," which was regarded as seditious or offensive, and the minutes record, January 16, 1683-4: "The Governor and Provincial Council have thought fit that for the great presumption and Contempt of this Government and authority, that Anto. Weston be whypt at ye market place on market daye three times, each time to have ten lashes at 12 of the clock at noone, this being ye first day." Several "freemen" who "subscribed to Anto. Weston's proposals" were to give bonds in fifty pounds each for their good behavior.

A case of difficulty came up in reference to the estate left behind him by Benjamin Acrod. A coroner's inquest had been held upon his body, and the jury found that he "killed himself with drinke." Probably the jury meant only to emphasize his intemperance, but the verdict on its face implied suicide. A special administrator of his estate was appointed, and the Governor expressly relinquished any claim he might have to the goods of one dying by his own hand.

In the records, December 26, we have the first indication of a teacher and school in Philadelphia. The minute says: "The Govr and Provll Council having taken into their Serious Consideration the great Necessity there is of a School Master for ye Instruction & Sober Education of Youth in the towne of Philadelphia, Sent for Enoch Flower, an Inhabitant of the said Towne, who for twenty year past hath been exercised in that care and Imploydnt in England, to whom haveing Communicated their Minds, he Embraced it upon these following Termes: to Learn to read English 4s by the Quarter, to Learn to read and write 6s by ye Quarter, to learn to read, Write and Cast accot 8s by Quarter; for Boarding a Scholler, that is to say, dyet, Washing, Lodging, & Schooling, Tenn pounds for one whole year."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

From time to time appointments made by the Governor were announced to the Council. May 2, "the Governor informed the Councill that he hath made choyce of Nich: Moore to be Secretary of ye Provincial Councill." The flurry over his "unreasonable and imprudent discourse" in March had subsided. December 27:
"This day, Thomas Lloyd was sent for before the board, and ye Governor was pleased to put him in Master of ye Rolls, who doth solemnly promise to officiate therein with care and diligence."

To this time belongs the first and only trial for witchcraft known to Pennsylvania history. We may remember that a little later, 1692, the terrible experiences of Massachusetts, the "Salem craze," began. On the Delaware, no doubt, the witchcraft superstition existed among the pioneer settlers, but, as this trial showed, it was easily possible to prevent its running to serious lengths.

In February, 1683-4, the minutes of the Provincial Council record the case. On the 7th, Margaret Matson and Yeshoo Hendrickson, two Swedish women, "were examined and about to be proved witches;" whereupon the Council ordered that Neels Matson should give bail in fifty pounds for his wife's further appearance on the 27th of the month, and Hendrick Jacobson¹ did the same for his wife. On the 27th, the Council being again met, a grand jury was present and Governor Penn "gave them their charge." The Attorney-General handed them a presentment upon which they made the return of true bill. A trial jury was then empanelled; it included our old acquaintance, Robert Wade, of ¹The curious twists of the Swedish naming will be noted here. The husband's and wife's family names are different.

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

Chester; and the trial of Margaret Matson proceeded. She plead not guilty. The record is of such interest that we may take it as it stands in the minutes, with slight abridgment:

"Henry Drystreet attested, Saith he was tould 20 years agoe, that the prisoner at the Barr was a Witch, & that Severall Cows were bewicht by her; also, that James Saunderling's mother tould him that she bewichted her cow, but afterwards said it w. s a mistake, and that her Cow should doe well againe, for it was not her Cow but an Other Person's that should Dye.

"Charles Ashcom attested, saith that Anthony's Wife being asked why she sould her Cattle; was because her mother had Bewicht them, having taken the Witchcraft of Hendrick's Cattle, and put it on their Oxen; She myght Keep but noe Other Cattle, and also that one night the Daughter of ye Prisoner called him up hastily, and when he came she sayd there was a great Light but Just before, and an Old woman with a Knife in her hand at ye Bedd's feet, and therefore shee cryed out and desired Jno. Symcock to take away his Calves, or Else she would send them to Hell.

"Annakey Coolin attested, saith her husband tooke the Heart of a Calfe that Dyed, as they thought, by Witchcraft, and Boyled it, whereupon the Prisoner at ye Barr came in and asked them what they were doing; they said boyl-ing of fleash; she said they had better they had Boyled the Bones, with several other unseemly Expressions.

"Margaret Mattson saith that She Vallues not Drystreet's Evidence; but if Sanderlin's mother had come, she would have answered her; also denyeth Charles Ashcom's Attestation at her Soul, and Saith where is my Daughter; let her come and say so.

"Annakey Cooling's attestation concerning the Gees, she denyeth, saying she was never out of her Canoe, and also that she never said any such things concerning the Calve's heart.

"Jno. Cock attested, sayeth he Knows nothing of the matter.

"Theo. Balding's attestation was read, and Tho Bracy attested, saith it is a True copy.

"The Prisoner denyeth all things, and saith that the Witnesses speak only by hearsay.

"After wch ye Govr gave the jury their Charge concerning ye Prisoner at ye Barr.

"The jury went forth, and upon their Returne Brought her in Guilty of haveing the Comon fame of a witch, but not guilty in manner and forme as Shee stands Indicted.

"Neels Mattson and Antho. Neelson Enters into a Recognizance of fifty pounds apiece, for the good behavior of Getro Hendrickson for six months."

The tide of immigration from countries other than England, which was to swell to such a height in years to come, now made its first appearance. The persecutions of the Huguenots in France, under Louis the Fourteenth—now drawing near the close of his long and evil reign—brought a group of these energetic people into Pennsylvania. September 10 (1683), the Council minutes record that "these persons following did solemnly promise before this honorable board faith and allegiance to the king, and fidelity and lawful obedience to William Penn, Proprietor and Governor: Capt. Gabrielle Rappe, Andrew Learrin, Andrew Inbert, Peter Meinardeau, Uslee, Lees Cosard, Nich. Riboleau, Jacob Raquier, Louis Boumat." Rappe is identified in the Huguenot chronicles as coming from the Isle of Rhé (La Rochelle) on the west coast of France, and Riboleau was probably from the same place. In a letter the following year (1684) to the Marquis of Halifax, Penn speaks of Captain Rappe as having begun to make wine from the native grapes—an industry on which the Governor bestowed much concern, but which never showed any very valuable result. His letters refer frequently to the subject. He speaks of one of the native grapes—"the great red grape, called by ignorance the fox grape," which "by art, doubtless, may be cultivated to an excellent wine." "There is a white kind of muskatel, and a little black grape"—the "chicken grape" no doubt—"like the cluster grape of England." Again, he says: "There grow wild an incredible number of vines, that tho' savage, and so not so excellent, beside that much wood and shade sour them, they yield a pleasant grape, and I have drank a good clarett, though small and greenish, of Capt. Rappe's vintage of the savage grape."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

More important, however, than the little party of Frenchmen, were the colonists that came this year, 1683, from Wales and from Germany. A few Welsh had arrived even before Penn, as we have seen, including the company in the Lion, in August, 1682, and some had come in the Welcome with him. This year others arrived, and the "Welsh Tract" west of Philadelphia, including the townships of Merion, Haverford, Radnor, and others, began to be compactly occupied by industrious settlers.

Persecution on account of their religious opinions had moved many of the newcomers, but they felt, besides, the hope of bettering their condition in a new land, under liberal and just laws. The

Nicholas Louis Zinzendorf

Count; bishop; missionary; gave name of Bethlehem to Moravian tract on the Lehigh river; traveled extensively in Pennsylvania doing missionary work, 1742

THE BEGINNINGS OF PENN'S COLONY

Welsh who now came were mostly Friends, upon whom the English laws of "conformity" still bore heavily. In Germany the patient and non-resistant followers of Menno Simon, the Mennonites, who now for two centuries have been an important element in Pennsylvania's population, had suffered untold miseries for a century and a half before the American door of release opened to them. So, too, up the Rhine, in the Palatinate, the desolations of the Thirty Years' War had hardly begun to be repaired when Turenne was sent by Louis XIV. to ravage the country in 1674—a prelude only to the still more cruel and effectual destruction wrought by the armies of Louis in 1689—and the distressed people there were ready to look for a new home, even across the ocean.

There arrived at Philadelphia in August of this year the first of the German settlers in Pennsylvania, and indeed the pioneer of the German movement to America. This was Francis Daniel Pastorius. He was now thirty-two years old. He had been born in Sommerhausen, September 26, 1651, had studied at some of the chief universities of Germany, and returning to Frankfort-on-the-Main in 1682 from an extended tour, learned there that in response to the invitations of Penn, and in recollection of the visit which he and his companions had paid that region in 1677, the organization of a company had been begun, the "Frankfort Company," to purchase a large tract of land in America. Pastorius was immediately attracted by the enterprise. "After I had sufficiently seen the European provinces and countries, and the threatening movements of war, and had taken to heart the dire changes and disturbances of the Fatherland," he says, "I was impelled through a special guidance from the Almighty, to go to Pennsylvania." He begged his father's consent to his emigration, and this being secured, he became the agent of the Frankfort Company, and prepared to depart.

Besides the group of Frankfort people who thus were interested in the new colony—none of whom, however, except Pastorius, actually came over—two other German groups were drawn into the movement. These were a small company of Friends at Kriegsheim (called by William Penn Krisheim, and remembered as Cresheim in our Germantown of Philadelphia), six miles from Worms, whom Penn visited in 1677, and who now came to Pennsylvania; and a larger group of original Mennonites, most of whom then or later became Friends, who lived at Crefeld, on the lower Rhine, within a few miles of the line of Holland. All these had heard of Penn and his colony through the advertisements and pamphlets, translated from English into German, which Benjamin Furly, the Rotterdam merchant, agent for Penn, had spread about. The Crefeld company had bought their land in two transactions. Jacob Telmer, of Crefeld, engaged in business as a merchant in Amsterdam, Jan Streypers, a merchant of Kaldkirchen; and Dirck Sipman, of Crefeld, had purchased from Penn, March 10, 1682, 15,000 acres. This was the first German purchase. June 11, 1683, three other Crefelders, Govert Remke, Lenart Arets, and Jacob Isaacs Van Bibber, brought 3,000 acres.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Pastorius left Frankfort in the spring of 1683, and passed down the Rhine. At Crefeld he conferred with some of the intending emigrants, at Rotterdam he saw Telmer, and doubtless Benjamin Furly, and at London, in May or June, he bought from Penn's agents 15,000 acres. The ship in which he sailed was the America, Joseph Wasey master, which left London June 10, and reached Philadelphia August 20. Thomas Lloyd, who came from Dolobran, Wales, was a fellow passenger; he was an older man than Pastorious and brought with him his wife and nine children, while the young German was still a bachelor.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE ENGLISH SETTLEMENT

THE descendants of those who emigrated from various parts of Europe or America to the western banks of the Delaware in the two last decades of the Seventeenth Century, in a generation or so were blended, and absorbed the Swedes and Dutch. The great majority of those emigrants were natives of England, and made Pennsylvania an English community, and substituted for every other mother tongue the English language in its purity. From the West Indies came Samuel Carpenter, Jonathan Dickinson, Isaac Norris, and others; from New England, Edward Shippen and Francis Richardson; from South Carolina, John Moore—all, so far as we know, natives of England. Robert Turner, Nicholas Newlin, and others had lived in Ireland, but were English by birth or parentage. The Irish Quakers were not the real Irish; the Bearní Feni was to them impossible jargon, if even they heard it from the peasants. These English-Irish are to be distinguished also from the Scotch-Irish, who began to come in the second decade of the Eighteenth Century, and possessed themselves of an immense region, which was a wilderness until after the death of the first Proprietary. Quite a number of Scotchmen had settled in the Jerseys, and in what is now the State of Delaware, and some of these came across or up the river. They were Lowlanders, not Celts. In fact, about the only representatives here of the ancient population of the British Isles were the Welsh. The preaching of Fox and other Children of the Light, as the Quakers first called themselves, was better received by the gentry of Wales than by the gentry of England, and those who settled the Welsh Tract near Philadelphia, bringing over genealogical trees giving each generation back to Adam, were of higher social position at home than the Anglo-Saxons whom Penn's agents induced to come. Some had been to college, or studied law or medicine, and were well read in Quaker divinity; probably all were familiar with the English language. The Germans who settled Germantown and its vicinity must be distinguished from those who arrived many years later, and were known as the Pennsylvania Dutch, and who so thoroughly adhered to their dialect, and transmitted it to their descendants that even in the middle of the Nineteenth Century the people of the townships settled by them, it is said, could not converse with the people of the adjoining townships settled by Scotch-Irish, and very recently a German edition of the laws and public documents was always printed by the State. The Germans who came before 1700, or very soon after, were Protestants of the various sects which may be embraced in the name of Pietists, neither Lutherans nor Moravians. Having among them scholars from the universities or well known schools, as a body they were in learning the equals, if not the superiors, of the Welsh, and far ahead of the English colonists; but in that day even the lower classes of England were not without some education, and there were a good number of persons in Pennsylvania of neither German nor Welsh, nor yet of Swedish extraction, who had been taught Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. The gift of preaching had made some who had not been educated for the priesthood, authors of controversial or pious writings. The Swedes belonged to the Church of Sweden, which was Lutheran in its theology, Episcopal in its organization, although no bishop ever lived here, and Erastian in its theory of mission. The clergy of Weccacoe (Swanson street near Washington avenue, Philadelphia), Kingessing (Woodland avenue, Philadelphia), and Upper Merion (Bridgeport, Montgomery county), were appointed by the Crown of Sweden until long after the American Revolution, when the vestries began calling presbyters of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States of America. There was no congregation of the Church of Eng-

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

THE ENGLISH SETTLEMENT

Charles

Clergyman; orator; born 1714; died 1770.
From an old engraving land within the limits of Pennsylvania, notwithstanding the stipulation in the charter for allowing such, until 1695; nor of the Presbyterians until later. Outside of the Swedes there was for a long time no ecclesiastical organization but the Society of Friends. The colony may be said to have been composed of its members. Their theology, except when following the Apology of Robert Barclay, was rather latitudinarian, while their demeanor was most precise. The laws of William Penn, while mild in the penalties, were decidedly "blue" in the prohibitions. The respect due to magistrates was insisted upon to the point of forbidding a word of criticism. With some feeling of gratitude to Penn, there was a strong sense of equality. A body of husbandmen and mechanics, one or two merchants, and a few school teachers and apothecaries, were establishing an Utopia away from the pomps and vanities, tyranny and injustice of the world. The persons who might claim to be the patricians of the new province were Penn's kindred and connections and his father's companions in arms, but when, in after years, something like a local aristocracy took shape, it was not made up of the descendants of these, and, too, it was not Quaker.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

By birth, education, and service with suffering in the cause of the Quaker religion, Thomas Lloyd had a prominence among the settlers next to Penn and Markham, and soon after arriving was appointed Master of the Rolls, and on the 10th of 1 mo., 1683-4, was elected a Provincial Councillor. Markham was already in England upon Penn's business when, in August, 1684, Penn, desirous of using his influence at Court to stop the persecution of the Quakers, left the province, commissioning the the Council to act in his stead, with Lloyd as President. He also appointed Lloyd Keeper of the Great Seal, and Lloyd, Robert Turner, and James Claypoole (brother of John Claypoole, who married Oliver Cromwell's daughter), Commissioners of Property, to grant warrants for surveying land, and to issue patents on the survey being duly made and returned. These commissioners acted only two years.

The Colony witnessed an impeachment trial as early as May, 1685. The Assembly presented a declaration against Nicholas Moore, who had been appointed prior or first judge of the Provincial Court, and was also a member of Assembly; that he, among other offenses, assuming "an unlimited and arbitrary power beyond the prescription or laws of this government had presumed" to appoint the time of the provincial circuits without the direction of the Provincial Council, whereby the several counties were surprised by the short notice, and juries, witnesses, etc., could not be duly summoned; that he had refused to receive a verdict, and sent back a jury with threats many times, until they brought in a different verdict; that in a civil action for trover and conversion he gave judgment of felony, and condemned the defendant to be whipped; that he by perverting the sense of a witness condemned him for perjury, and fined him, and by proclamation rendered him incapable of being rectus in Curia; that he censured in open court the decisions of preceding judges; that he reversed the judgment of county justices in a matter not regularly before him; that he declined going to the two lower circuits, although the law obliged the judges to go spring and fall; and that he declared that he was not accountable to the President and Provincial Council, by despising their orders and precepts: therefore, the Assembly prayed his removal. This declaration, Patrick Robinson said, was drawn "at hab nab;" so the Assembly deemed itself insulted, and in a body complained to the Council, which unanimously declared the expression "indecent, unallowable, and to be disowned!" The managers of the impeachment, in proof of the first charge against Moore, showed that the sheriff of Chester county had only five days time to get the freemen to court. In regard to sending back a jury, the jury had given £8 to the plaintiff, whose declaration was for £500; Moore, who was a doctor, not a lawyer, thereupon said, "What is £8 in comparison of £500? find according to evidence or you are all perjured." So the jury went out, and the next day found for the defendant with costs! It rather seems as if Moore overreached himself. The witness convicted of perjury was John Harrison. Moore asked him what he knew concerning the taking of a hog. Harrison said he knew nothing of the taking of it, for he was in Philadelphia. Moore, after several other questions, asked if he had seen or eaten any of it. He said he had both seen and eaten. Moore told the jury that this was perjury. Moore had called the Provincial Council fools and loggerheads, and said it were well if all the laws had dropped, and there would never be good times as long as Quakers had the administration. Before Moore's impeachment trial was finished he was very ill, and a new set of Provincial Judges were commissioned.

THE ENGLISH SETTLEMENT

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Whitefield House or Nazareth Stockade

George Whitefield commenced the erection of this building in 1741, to be used as a Methodist school for negroes; the same year he sold the unfinished building to Bishop Spangenberg of the Moravian church. In 1743 work was resumed and the building finished. From a sketch made especially for this work.

Lloyd, desiring to be relieved of office, the government by the Council was terminated on 12 mo. 9, 1687-8, when there was received from Penn a commission to five persons, Lloyd, Turner, John Simcock, Arthur Cook, and John Eckley to exercise the powers of a deputy-governor. This arrangement lasted about ten months. Penn offered the lieutenant-governorship again to

THE ENGLISH SETTLEMENT

Lloyd, but he refused, and, no other Quaker fit for it being willing to accept, Penn conferred it upon Capt. John Blackwell, then in New England, who had been treasurer of the army in the time of the Commonwealth, a man of high reputation for integrity, who had refused a great office in Ireland under Charles II and James II because it depended upon perquisites. He was a Puritan, and had married a daughter of General Lambert. Nathaniel Mather (Mass. Hist. Coll.) wrote of him in 1684, "For serious reall piety & nobleness of spirit, prudence, etc., I have not been acquainted with many that equall him." He arrived December 17, 1688, his first act, strange to say, being the setting apart of a day "for solemn thanksgiving to Almighty God for His inestimable blessing to his Majesty's kingdoms and dominions by the birth of a Prince" (James II's unfortunate son, who had come so unwelcome to Protestant England that his parentage was impugned).

Lloyd, still Keeper of the Great Seal and Master of the Rolls, was very troublesome to Blackwell throughout his whole term of office. First, he refused to pass certain commissions under the seal. Afterwards, as he was going to New York, he was requested to leave the seal with the Council, that public business might not be obstructed, but he declined, declaring it out of its power to deprive a man of an office which he held for life. He refused to hand over the official communications received during his presidency, although the Council resolved that all letters of instruction should be delivered to the secretary, and such parts of other letters as gave any instructions should be copied for public use. He refused to seal the commission for a Provincial Court, declaring the document "more moulded by fancy than formed by law." Moreover, he undertook to appoint as Clerk of the Peace, David Lloyd, whom the Lieutenant-Governor and Council had just suspended for refusing to produce papers. In March, 1689, Thomas Lloyd was by Bucks county again elected a member of the Council, but the Lieutenant-Governor proposed articles of impeachment. The councillors objecting to take part in this measure, Blackwell adjourned that meeting. But when they next met, Lloyd very coolly entered the room, saying that he had come to take his place. The Governor said there was nothing expected of him until he answered the charges. Lloyd replied that he had as good a right to sit there as the Governor had to be Governor. As he refused to withdraw, Blackwell adjourned to his own lodgings, ordering the members to follow him. Some staid to fight it out with Lloyd; but such were the "sharp and unsavory expressions" used by the latter that Markham, the secretary, induced the Governor to return. Lloyd was again commanded to depart, and the other members followed Blackwell. A similar scene was enacted at a subsequent meeting.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Blackwell was continuously opposed by the most important Quakers, to the chagrin of William Penn, who had thought that the high character of Blackwell would make his government satisfactory to Friends, while his not being of that sect would leave him free to obey the Crown. Penn wrote to Blackwell on 7 mo. 25, 1689: "I would be as little vigorous as possible; and do desire thee, by all the obligation I and my present circumstances can have upon thee to desist ye prosecution of T. L. I entirely know ye person both in his weakness and accomplishment, and would thee end ye dispute between you two upon my single request and command and that former inconveniences be rather mended than punished. Salute me to ye people in generall, pray send for J. Simcock, A. Cook, John Eckley, and Samuel Carpenter, and let them dispose T. L. and Sa. Richardson to that complying temper that may tend to that loving and serious accord yt becomes such a government."

In November, 1689, Blackwell received a letter from the Earl of Shrewsbury, dated April 13, announcing that war with France was expected, and directing that care be taken for opposing any attempt upon Pennsylvania. On this being read to the councillors, half of whom were Quakers, Simcock said, "I see no danger but from bears and wolves. We are well and in peace and quiet. Let us keep ourselves so. I know not but a peaceable spirit, and that will do well. For my part, I am against it clearly, and Governor, if we refuse to do it, thou wilt be excused." Griffith Jones asked that they wait a little longer, for the country would not be able to bear such a charge without necessity, and added, "Every one that will may provide his arms. My opinion is that it be left to the discretion of the Governor to do what he shall judge necessary." Samuel Carpenter was not against those who put themselves in readiness for defense, but as it was against his judgment he could not advise it. The King of England knew the judgment of Quakers in such a case when he granted Penn his patent. Quakers would rather suffer than do this thing; in which latter statement Bartholomew Coppock agreed. At the next meeting, Simcock, Coppock, Carpenter, Jones, and John Bristow declared that they could not vote on the question at all. They did not take it upon themselves to hinder others. They did not think the Governor need call them together in the matter. So Blackwell declared that he would do what was his duty, without further pressing them.

THE ENGLISH SETTLEMENT

In response to letters from both Blackwell and his enemies, Penn relieved him of the government, and, that the councillors should have no occasion for grumbling, submitted to their choice two commissions duly signed, one authorizing the whole body to act as Blackwell's successor, they choosing a president, and the other permitting them to name three persons in the province or lower counties, from whom Penn would choose one as Lieutenant-Governor, and until his mind should be known the one having the most votes or being first chosen should act as such. On 11 mo. 2, 1689-90, the Council unanimously accepted the commission appointing the whole body as Penn's deputy, and elected Thomas Lloyd President. Under Lloyd's presidency, the lower counties became discontented. After long complaint of the delay of justice, six of their councillors, in November, 1690, undertook to appoint new judges; an act which the Council at large repudiated, promising however to appoint others, of whom a Delaware man should be president in Delaware. On 1 mo. 30, 1691, there were submitted for the Council's choice two new commissions, one for the Council to name three persons from whom Penn would appoint a Lieutenant-Governor, the person having most votes to act until Penn's pleasure should be known, the other for Lloyd, Markham, Turner, Jennings, and John Cann, or any three of them, to exercise a lieutenant-governor's powers, and if neither commission were accepted, the government to remain in the whole Council. The councillors from Philadelphia, Bucks and Chester were unanimous for a single executive, but those from Delaware, seeing that Lloyd would be chosen, declared against it. Ten members being present, Lloyd in the chair, Growdon called out, "You that is for Thomas Lloyd, Arthur Cook and John Goodson to be nominated Deputy-Governor stand up and say yea." Whereupon the Delawareans, protesting that the charter required two-thirds as a quorum and a two-thirds vote in "affairs of moment," left the meeting. Three days later, six of them, claiming that the government was still in the Council, met at New Castle, and chose Cann president. Lloyd, made Lieutenant-Governor until Penn's appointment should be known, accepted at the importunity of friends, and tried to win back the Delawareans, but in vain. Penn was grieved at his acting upon this "broken choice," and urged a reunion, but finally commissioned Lloyd as Lieutenant-Governor of Pennsylvania, and Markham as Lieutenant-Governor of the Lower Counties. This arrangement lasted until the arrival of Governor Fletcher.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The first charter to the city of Philadelphia was granted on 3rd mo. 20, 1691, Humphrey Morrey being named as Mayor, John Delavall as Recorder, and David Lloyd as Town Clerk.

It was during Lloyd's administration that George Keith caused a schism in the Society of Friends, resulting in the growth of the Baptist denomination and the establishment of most of the Title page Saur Bible

The first Bible printed in America in a European language

THE ENGLISH SETTLEMENT

oldest Episcopal churches in the Middle States, Keith finally taking orders in the Church of England. He had studied at Aberdeen, and had been one of the great champions of the Society, had appeared at several disputations, and written many books in support of its tenets, travelled with Penn and Barclay on the Continent in its service, and suffered long imprisonment and much pecuniary loss in its cause. He came to America embittered by persecution, and practiced in controversy, was some time Surveyor-General of East Jersey, and for a year taught the Friends' School in Philadelphia, but relinquished such occupation to travel to other colonies to preach and to challenge the opponents of Quakerism. He justly deemed himself the greatest man in the Society in America. He contended for greater plainness of dress, objected to Quakers acting as magistrates giving sentence for corporal punishment, proposed rules of discipline and government, and importuned for a confession of faith. A theologian inferior only to Barclay of all whom the Society had produced, he was quick to detect the erroneous doctrine in the loose preaching of those around him, and he attacked the preachers in the strongest words. He accused Fitzwater and Stockdale before the Meeting for having declared that "the light of Christ was sufficient for salvation without anything else," thereby inferring that there was no need of the coming of Christ. The Meeting, which could not refuse to censure Stockdale, blamed Keith for violating Gospel order in not first communicating with Stockdale, and for his rancorous expressions. Stockdale and Fitzwater brought charges of bad doctrine against Keith, and Bowden, in his History of Friends in America, says there is no doubt that he had departed from the views of the Quakers on the efficacy and universality of Divine grace. Keith's friends, remaining at a monthly meeting after the clerk had left, adjourned to the school-house, and there, mustering a great force, condemned his accusers, and suspended them from the ministry. The Quarterly Meeting set aside these proceedings. Keith, unable to carry his proposals as to the time of meetings for worship, at last started a separate meeting, the attendants on which assumed the name of Christian Quakers. In the severest language he denounced his former comrades, who, he said, came together "to cloak heresies and deceit." Keith declared that Lloyd was not fit to be Governor, and "his name would stink," and Keith told the Quarterly Meeting of Ministers in 1st mo., 1692, that there were "more damnable heresies and doctrines of devils among the Quakers than among any profession of Protestants." At the next Quarterly Meeting, a declaration of disunity with him was issued, headed by Lloyd's signature; and for his slanderous words against Lloyd and Samuel Jennings, one of the justices, he was tried before the county court at Philadelphia, and fined, and Bradford, the printer, who was publishing his address to the Quakers, was deprived of his tools, and thrown into prison, as were John Macomb, who circulated it, and Thomas Budd, who wrote a pamphlet on Keith's side. The Quakers alleged, and perhaps justly, that the pamphlets tended to sedition, but these proceedings were the grounds of a charge that the Quakers, as well as other religious bodies, could persecute, as though this mild correction for intemperate language was to be classified with the fires of Smithfield, or the lashings on the Quakers' backs—and putting three Quakers to death—in New England.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

It was for only about a dozen years in the history of Pennsylvania prior to 1790 that there were an upper and lower house participating in legislation. Under the frame of government dated April 25, 1682, and that of the next year, which was carried out until the time of Fletcher, the Provincial Council proposed all laws, and the Assembly in a few days' session accepted or rejected them. It may be interesting to know the names of some of those early legislators whom their neighbors chose to represent them in either the Council or Assembly. William Markham was the first cousin of William Penn, being son of Admiral Penn's sister. The name is found at an early period among the gentry of old Printed by the University of Cambridge Press, 1847.

THE ENGLISH SETTLEMENT

England, or that class which in Continental Europe would be called the lesser nobility. There was a Sir John Markham, Judge of the Common Pleas from 1396 to 1407, from whom two families descended, both seated in Nottinghamshire, bearing the same arms, which also the William Markham who came to Pennsyl-

Old Franklin Press

Photographed especially for this work by J. F. Sachse from the original in possession of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania vania used as a seal impaled with the arms of Thomas of Dublin. He is described as "Captain Markham" at the time when Penn intrusted him with the inauguration of a government over his newly acquired territories. It is a mere conjecture, but we hazard it, that he was son of the Henry Markham who was colonel in Ireland in Cromwell's time, during which Admiral Penn received lands there. William Markham died poor in 1704, and sixty years later his granddaughter was receiving a pension from the Proprietaries.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Christopher Taylor is said to have been a Puritan minister prior to conversion by George Fox, and was a schoolmaster in England, and the author of a compendium of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, published in 1679. Thomas Holme, who succeeded Captain William Crispin as Surveyor-General of the province, and in a few years published a map of all the lots, bore the title of captain as no mere compliment or local rank, for he was such in the army of Oliver Cromwell. Holme became a member of the Society of Friends in 1659, and in April, 1682, was a resident of the city of Waterford, Ireland. One of his daughters married in 1683 Captain Crispin's son Silas, who in some way, probably maternally, was a cousin of William Penn. John Simcock, of humbler antecedents, was called by the Quakers "a nursing father in Israel." The career in Pennsylvania of Ralph Withers, Francis Whitwell, John Songhurst, and William Stockdale, ministers among Friends, was cut short by early death. William Biles will appear later in these pages. His son William married the daughter of Thomas Langhorne, assemblyman, who had been a preacher in England. Langhorne's son became Chief Justice of the province. James Harrison, a shoemaker, who had travelled much as a preacher, acted as Penn's steward at the manor which was surveyed for the Proprietary in Bucks county, and called Pennsbury. Harrison's son-in-law, Phineas Pemberton, a grocer from Lancashire, was one of the most important office-holders in the province. The ancestor of the Confederate general who surrendered to Grant at Vicksburg, he is to be classed as one of the patriarchs from whom the more important people of Philadelphia have descended. His son Israel, a merchant, sat in the Assembly, and a second Israel, called "junior" prior to 1754, was sometimes called "King of the Quakers," while his brother James was one of the Quaker assemblymen who could not be brought to vote for military measures. William Yardley was Phineas

THE ENGLISH SETTLEMENT

Pemberton's uncle. He and Thomas Janney left large families, the latter's name being widely spread also in Virginia. Thomas Wynne was a Welsh surgeon, also preacher and writer; his name still survives, while his daughter, who married Edward Jones, another Welsh physician, was grandmother of Thomas Cadwalader, whom we shall note as a councillor to later Lieutenant-Governors, and great-grandmother of John Dickinson, who became head of the government of the State. John Eckley, another preacher, dying in 1690, left an only daughter, who ran off from the Quakers, and was married over in New Jersey by a Church of England missionary to Colonel Daniel Coxe, who had large proprietary interests in that province and was son of the physician to Charles II., who was at one time patentee of Carolina. The Coxes of Drifton, Pa., are descendants. Samuel Carpenter was the rich man of the early day, but lost considerable property. One of his grandsons removed to Salem county, New Jersey; a granddaughter was ancestress of an extensive branch of the Wharton family of the present day, including Joseph Wharton, William Wharton, Wharton Barker, and Bromley Wharton, private secretary to Governor Pennypacker, and also of John M. Scott, now President pro tem. of the State Senate; while Samuel Richardson, at one time fellow member with Carpenter of the Provincial Council, was ancestor of Governor Pennypacker. Robert Turner had been a merchant in Dublin: one of his daughters married Francis Rawle, who was an important man at an early date. James Claypoole was the ancestor of the present Cornelius Vanderbilt of New York. The names of Newlin, Maris, Pennock, Levis, Waln and Kirkbride are yet extant among us. The male line of Caleb Pusey, a preacher and a writer against George Keith, is extinct. Griffith Owen, another preacher, was a Welsh physician. Joseph Growdon, when of Anstle in the county of Cornwall, gentleman, joined his father, Lawrence Growdon, of Trevoise in said county, gentleman, as one of the "first purchasers," they buying from William Penn before his first visit to Pennsylvania the goodly quantity of 5,000 acres each. These they had located upon the Neshaminy Creek in Bucks county. Joseph Growdon came to America very soon after the purchase, and settled upon the property, building a dwelling-house still standing, and giving it the name of "Trevoze." He was several terms Speaker. Of his children, Joseph became Attorney-General of the province; Elizabeth married Francis Richardson, her descendants being found to-day in Philadelphia; Grace married David Lloyd; and Lawrence became a member of the Governor's council, one of Lawrence's daughters marrying in 1753 the prominent politician, Joseph Galloway. David Lloyd was a cousin of Thomas Lloyd. Thomas Lloyd was the third son of Charles Lloyd of Dolobran by his wife Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Stanley of Knockin. The writer of these lines has set forth the ancestry in "The Provincial Councillors of Pennsylvania;" it will contribute to an understanding of our colonial history to know that John Delaval, Richard Hill (who married Delaval's widow), Samuel Preston, and Isaac Norris were Lloyd's sons-in-law. Isaac Norris and William Trent in 1704 bought a tract belonging to William Penn's son William, and on this was duly laid out the town of Norristown.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

CHAPTER IX.

THE SUSPENSION AND RESTORATION OF PENN'S GOVERNMENT AND HIS SECOND VISIT

WILLIAM Penn had not been brought up a business man, but a knight's son, to be courtier and soldier, while bailiffs, solicitors and agents drew up his papers and handled his money. He had sacrificed the husbanding of his patrimony to the career of a minister among Friends, which, involving trials and punishment, traveling and putting forth books, engrossed his attention, and devoured his income as much perhaps as would have the diversions of the worldly. In the great land speculation into which philanthropy had led him, the Indians were not cheated with a few beads, and the impost which the colonists in 1683 offered to him was refused; so the first cost was very heavy. He undertook when the Duke of York became King of England to be the patron at Court of those persecuted on account of religion, and so "overspent" the considerable sum of £3000 in that reign. Then came the war in Ireland, and other causes by which his estate, called Shanagarry, near Cork, was unproductive. In 1705 he estimated that on an average in the fifteen years between his first and second visits to Pennsylvania he had spent £400 annually in London "to hinder much mischief against us if not to do us much good."

Indebtedness from residence in London was not the only bad result of intimacy with James II. Penn was long suspected of being a Papist, and even called a Jesuit; and after the Revolution of 1688 was several times accused of connection with plots to restore James to the throne. Although escaping conviction of any actual treason to William and Mary, Penn was deprived of the governorship of Pennsylvania and the counties on the Delaware on the ground of his administration of it being a failure, and as a matter of prudence at a time when there was war with France. Some lawyers were of the opinion that the powers of government granted to William Penn were part of the regalia of the Crown, which Charles II could not alienate for longer than his own life. But without any judicial decision or even the bringing of a writ of quo warranto, the region was committed to the care of Benjamin Fletcher, esq., as Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief, he holding the same position in the province of New York and its dependencies. He was thus made responsible for the defense of a settlement of which the inhabitants were conscientiously opposed to war, and which a force of 500 men could capture in the unprepared condition in which he found it. He tried to be considerate of the Quakers, and was careful of the property rights of the Proprietary, while laboring to organize and secure appropriations for a militia. His commission, dated October 21, 1692, under which he did not take possession until April 26, 1693, required him to appoint a Lieutenant-Governor and a Council, and to execute such reasonable laws as were then in force or thereafter agreed upon by him with the advice and consent of the Council and Assembly. He offered the first place in the Council to Lloyd, who declined it. Then he conferred it upon Markham, whom, on April 27, with the unanimous consent of the other councillors, he appointed Lieutenant-Governor. On a question of the validity of the former laws, Fletcher confirmed most of them, with some amendments to make them conform more to the laws of England, until the royal pleasure should be known. When the Assembly would not set back the wheels of progress by making burglary punishable with death, he yielded. He was willing to fix a salary of six shillings a day for each member and nine shillings for the

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

SUSPENSION AND RESTORATION

Speaker; but the councillors, unable to obtain a salary for themselves or the Lieutenant-Governor, unanimously rejected the bill. The Assembly granted in 1693 a tax of 1*d.* per pound for the support of the government, and the next year would have done the same in reply to his promise that, in consideration of their scruples, the money "should not be dipped in blood," but should "feed the hungry and clothe the naked" Indians, unable to hunt because fighting for the English, but Fletcher would not consent to the formal appropriation of part of the proceeds to Lloyd and Markham. Lloyd died Sept. 10, 1694.

Penn, on December 4, 1692, wrote to his friends in Pennsylvania to get one hundred persons there to lend him £100 each for three years, without interest, in which case he would in six months come over with all his family. The amount was not raised. Nevertheless Penn, at the beginning of August, 1694, attended the committee of the Privy Council for trade and plantations, and promised that if restored to the government, he would with all convenient speed go to Pennsylvania, and would transmit to the Council and Assembly Queen Mary's orders, which, he declared, he did not doubt would be complied with, as well as at all times such orders as their Majesties might give for supplying a quota of men, or defraying the share of the expense their Majesties should think necessary for the safety of the dominions in America; furthermore, he would appoint Markham as his deputy; and if the government of Pennsylvania should not comply with the royal orders, Penn would submit the direction of the military to their Majesties' pleasure; and the laws passed by the Assembly in May, 1693, not yet confirmed or rejected by her Majesty, should be executed until altered by the Assembly. The Attorney-General and Solicitor-General gave an opinion that the government granted to Penn, being subject to their Majesties' sovereignty, their Majesties could appoint a governor in extraordinary exigencies through the default or neglect of Penn or those appointed by him in protecting or defending the province or inhabitants in time of danger, but the right of government belonged to him when those reasons failed or ceased. The committee recommended the restoration of the government, with directions that on application of the Governor or commander-in-chief of New York, a quota not exceeding 80 men or the value of the charge thereof be sent from Pennsylvania to New York. Accordingly, William and Mary, by letters patent dated August 20, 1694, received in Pennsylvania the following March, announced that they had thought fit to restore the administration of the government to Penn, and that the authority of Fletcher should cease. The next day the Queen signed a letter commanding the Proprietary at all times on request of the governor and commander-in-chief of New York to send 80 men with their officers or the expense of maintaining the same for the defense of the latter province, and that the Proprietary give directions for making provision for the same at the public charge of the province of Pennsylvania and country of New Castle.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Not yet able to return to America, Penn on 9 mo. 24, 1694, commissioned Markham as Lieutenant-Governor, with the advice and consent of John Goodson and Samuel Carpenter as Assistants, or either of them. The commissions read "to govern according to the known laws and usages," and Markham proceeded under the frame of government of 1683, causing a Provincial Council to be elected. Fletcher, still commander-in-chief at New York, on April 15, 1695, made application for the eighty men and a captain, two lieutenants, etc., to be at Albany as soon as possible after May 1, and renewed the application in June, asking that they be at Albany as soon as possible after August 1; but the councilors, on account of harvest, would not allow the Assembly to be convened before September 9; and to Markham's question: "Would you be willing that if an enemy should assault us I should defend you by force of arms?" some answered that they would; others, that they must leave every one to his own liberty, and that Governor Penn's instructions must be followed, and it

Specimen of Ephrata Cloister Pen Work, 1747

From the collection of J. F. Sachse

SUSPENSION AND RESTORATION

being his business they had nothing to do with it. By the time the Assembly met, choosing Edward Shippen as Speaker, it had come to be the opinion of the members of both that body and the Council that the frame of government was no longer in force, and so, after recalling Fletcher's promise when Governor of Pennsylvania that the money voted to him for support of government should be applied to providing for the Indians, and declaring that what they might now vote for the King to be used as he pleased, should be deemed a compliance with the letter of the Queen as far as conscience and ability permitted, the Council and Assembly tacked an act of settlement establishing a charter to an act appropriating 250*l.* for the support of the King's government; but Markham did not feel that he could so bind the Proprietary, and, despairing of obtaining satisfaction of the military demands, exercised the prerogative which the denial of the validity of the old frame left him, and dissolved both Council and Assembly. Fletcher in lamentation wrote in June, 1696: "The town of Philadelphia in fourteen years' time is become near equal to the city of New York in trade and riches," and explained that the hardships of defending his province had driven many of the people to Philadelphia to enjoy their ease, and, there being no duty on trade in Pennsylvania, the trade of his province had been drawn thither. Markham, some of whose letters to Penn were captured by the French, and others, delayed by the roundabout voyages, was without instructions as to a Council.

Meanwhile Penn, fifty-one years of age, was taking a step for which mankind does not blame him, but which lowered the prospects in life of his three children then living, carried him into greater expenditure and deeper embarrassment, dragged his friends and taxpayers into the hardship of assisting him, and finally placed Pennsylvania under a new family with no other wealth than what could be gotten out of it—his second marriage 1 mo. 5, 1695-6. His children then living were Springett, the eldest, William, and Letitia. His eldest son died a month after this without issue. The second son, two years later, married at the age of nineteen. Of the object of young William's "impetuous inclination," his father writes in 1707: "I wish she had brought more wisdom since she brought so little money to help the family." The young man, by 1703, when he came to Pennsylvania, jealous of his step-mother and her children, and emancipated from his father, had raised his own set of creditors. The marriage portion of his sister, who became the wife of William Aubrey, was with difficulty raised. A note to the Penn and Logan Correspondence, published by the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, has passed an eulogium on Penn's second wife, Hannah, daughter of Thomas Callowhill, a worthy Quaker, dealer in groceries in Bristol; and it would be an ungracious task to contradict it, if we could. Suffice it to say, she was not satisfied to live in Pennsylvania, and inasmuch as she was of less social position than his first wife, Gulielma Maria, daughter of Sir William Springett, and had no influential connections to strengthen her husband in England, we may hazard the remark that a Pennsylvania girl would have been better for the lord of Pennsylvania; such a choice and remaining here would have had one worldly advantage—that of popularizing him.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

On September 25, 1696, Markham appointed a Council for himself, and on October 26, John Goodson resigned as Assistant, and Arthur Cook presented commissions from the Proprietary, which Cook had kept secret for eighteen months, authorizing Markham to act according to law and charter with Samuel Jennings and Arthur Cook as Assistants. An Assembly was summoned and chose John Simcock Speaker, and passed five acts to which Markham consented on November 7, of which the last three were respectively how to raise county levies, for preventing of hogs, etc., running at large in the town of Chester, and for preventing accidents by fire in the towns of Philadelphia and New Castle. The first of the acts was a frame of government providing among other things for a Council of two members elected from each of the six counties, and an Assembly of four elected from each county, the right of electing or being elected being confined to free denizens over twenty-one years old, having fifty acres of land, ten being seated and cleared, or having 50*l.* clear estate, and resident within the government two years before the election; any voter receiving a reward or gift for his vote should forfeit the right to vote that year, and any person giving or promising the same,

SUSPENSION AND RESTORATION

Early specimens of Wood Cuts made at Ephrata Community

From the Danner collection in order to be elected, or offering to serve for nothing or for less wages than allowed by law, should be incapable of serving that year; the real estate of an alien dying before denizenation should pass as if he had been denizenised; the inhabitants should have liberty to fish and hunt upon their lands or any lands not enclosed. The act was to be in force until the Proprietary should signify his pleasure to the contrary, but nothing in the act was to preclude the inhabitants from any rights, privileges or immunities under the old frame of 1683 or belonging to them by virtue of any law, charter, or grants whatsoever. By the second act, id. per pound, etc., tax was levied, which raised 300*l.* Pennsylvania money for

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Fletcher, who sent his thanks, but explained that what he had asked was the equivalent of 2,000*l*.

In December, Penn suggested to the Lords of Trade that the best way to regulate the quota would be by two deputies from each province meeting in a common assembly once a year or oftener during the war, and at least once in two years in times of peace, the Governor of New York presiding as the King's commissioner, and that the body should settle complaints between the provinces, and the King's commissioner should be commander-in-chief of the quotas against the common enemy. It was in pursuance of this idea that the congress at Albany was held in 1754, and the wisest men engaged in American affairs endeavored for a union of the colonies until one was actually effected in the Revolutionary War.

Philip Ford, the agent who had sold to the first purchasers, and managed other of Penn's affairs, claiming a balance of £10,500, Penn in March, 1696-7, deeded to him Pennsylvania and the Lower Territories, taking in return, instead of a defeasance to prove the transaction a mortgage, a lease dated April 1, 1697, for three years at £630 rent. The purpose of this was to enable Ford to escape a tax on personal estate, which his rights really were.

Markham's administration lasted until the arrival of William Penn the second time in America. These four years and a half were the great day of piracy on the American coast, the time of Captain Kidd. Much of the trade in the seaport towns was in ill-gotten goods, and the cupidity of the adventurers who held the offices for the execution of the laws bound them to the pirates. Markham's son-in-law, James Brown, at one time in the Assembly from Kent, was a pirate, sent to England in 1700, and, it is believed, hung. Most of the governors of New York were charged with some kind of malfeasance, and Benjamin Fletcher, it was said, licensed vessels sailing from New York with piratical designs. Edw. Randolph, Surveyor-General of Customs, accused Markham of conniving at piracy, and wrote that certain well known pirates had been seen in Philadelphia, and that Markham had paid no attention to the Lords' proclamations, had neglected to prosecute forfeited bonds, and had adjourned the courts, to the benefit of fraudulent debtors. Some months later, when a piratical craft had come into Delaware bay, taking nine or ten ships, and committed several robberies on the people of Pennsylvania, Markham applied to the Earl of Bellomont for a man-of-war to guard the bay, but none were at the officer's disposal. Certain offenders being found in town, and pointed out to Markham, he made several arrests. Although the province contained at least 7,000 men capable of bearing arms, he was a weak governor at such times for want of a militia.

SUSPENSION AND RESTORATION

During Markham's administration, Robert Quarry, formerly Governor of South Carolina, became Judge of the Admiralty in Pennsylvania, and John Moore, who was a lawyer, the advocate in such matters. At the instigation of David Lloyd, who had had an education in the law, Anthony Morris, an early mayor of Philadelphia, at this time a justice of the county court, granted a writ of replevin by which certain goods seized by Quarry's order were taken out of the marshal's hands, and the owner, by Lloyd as attorney, prosecuted the marshal for the detainer. The marshal in justification, produced the King's letters patent with the King's effigy stamped at its head and the wax seal depending in a tin case. Lloyd, taking the commission in his hand, and exhibiting it, declaimed, "What is this? Do you think to scare us with a great box and a little baby. 'Tis true, fine pictures please children; but we are not to be frightened at such a rate." Penn was obliged by Quarry's reporting the replevin to the British government to have Morris removed from his judgeship, and when, in 1700, Lloyd was elected a councillor, Penn suspended him pending trial for these disrespectful speeches and postures. Perhaps from their extortionate practices, the customs officials gave Lloyd good reason for another remark with which he was charged, that whoever were instrumental or aided in erecting or encouraging a court of admiralty in the province were greater enemies to the liberties and privileges of the people than those who promoted ship money in King Charles I's time. Crown officers and Churchmen, Quarry and his followers were on guard against citizens and Quakers. Quarry reported the shortcomings in the administration not only of Markham, but of Penn

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Thomas Cadwalader

Physician; for many years a leader in the work of the Pennsylvania Hospital and the deputies following him, and was the head of what Penn called the "hot Church party," which had many adherents in the Proprietary's possessions on Delaware bay. In Pennsylvania, in all the struggles as to arming the province down to the Revolution, the laymen of Christ Church, Philadelphia, in the establishment of which John Moore had been most prominent, next to Joshua Carpenter, were the nucleus of the political party opposed to the Society of Friends.

SUSPENSION AND RESTORATION

When about to come a second time to Pennsylvania, William Penn secured as secretary James Logan of Bristol, born in Ireland of a good Scotch family, who had taught school, but was then in mercantile business, and they, with Penn's wife and her children, sailed from Cowes on September 9th, 1699, in the 'Canterbury.' On the way over a ship was sighted supposed to be an enemy, and Logan took arms for defense, while Penn, the stauncher Quaker—perhaps because a Quaker by conversion, while Logan was only a Quaker by birth—retired down below. The danger passed, after which Penn expostulated with Logan for engaging in battle. Logan replied that if Penn had disapproved, Penn, being Logan's master, should have ordered him down. They arrived in Philadelphia in December. Penn made the "slate-roof house" on Second street his residence, and Logan lived with him. The country seat was at the manor of Pennsbury in Bucks county.

To satisfy the British government, Penn soon summoned an Assembly, and secured a law against piracy and a law against illegal trade, and was able thus to express himself, "After so many calumnies and complaints we have been loaded with, I hope these two laws will in some degree wash us clean." An effort was made to give Penn a tax of 3*d.* per l., but it was voted down. However, an impost on liquor, yielding between 500*l.* and 1000*l.*, was granted to him. Disagreeing to Markham's frame of government passed in 1696, the Proprietary thought the old frame of 1683 in force until abrogated as provided for in it. Accordingly the old frame was surrendered by the unanimous vote of the Council and Assembly on June 7, 1700, and it was unanimously agreed that all laws, including those passed at Chester in 1683, and the petition of right, and those just made at this session, should be in force only until twenty days after the adjournment of the next session. The next Assembly being opened at New Castle in October, Penn urged the importance of a frame of government and new set of laws, a statute of limitations or for quiet-

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

ing title to property, and a supply for the support of government. The Assembly levied a tax to raise 2000*l.* for him. This was not paid with the alacrity with which it was granted. It was claimed that the first purchasers having paid cash for their lands, had agreed to pay the quit rent to compensate the Proprietary for his expenses in the government. The opinionated religionists who were the majority of the colonists seem to have looked upon him as a Joshua making a distribution of the land; whereas his legal status was that of a William the Conqueror establishing a feudal system. They rather thought that he should sell to new purchasers at the old price, notwithstanding the rise in value. They considered the unsold land between Vine and South streets as a common, and from it they cut their wood. Of two grievances they felt assured. When the ten per cent. of the first purchases, instead of being located within the city of Philadelphia, were satisfied by land in the Liberties, lots in the city proper were given in addition, and were understood to be a free gift, whereas they were patented subject to quit rents. When, in 1701, the Assembly was asked to suggest a suitable expedient for the people's safety in privileges and property, the reply was, a charter embracing twenty-one favors, of which the eighth was to make the inhabitants easy in this matter of the city lots. Penn's answer was that he had tied them to nothing which the first purchasers present in the allotment of the city had not seemed readily to comply with, and by a replotting their lots had been increased to a double frontage; if they would surrender the increase, he would be easy as to the quit rents. The Assembly asked him to call the parties concerned; the latter were never either convinced or relieved. The other grievance was as to the land taken for roads. As an allowance for this, ten per cent. was added to the quantity of land paid for. The third favor asked by the Assembly was that for the future there be no such delays as in the past in the granting of patents for land, and the 10 per cent. be allowed. Penn promised his endeavor to prevent such delay and to allow the ten per cent. when there was an overplus, but only two per cent. on surveyed lands when no more was to be found. However, he finally offered six per cent., whether so much had been included in the lines of the survey or not, and on this compromise the assemblymen were brought to his house on his last day in Philadelphia half an hour before his leaving them, and shut up in his parlor. They announced an acceptance under protest.

SUSPENSION AND RESTORATION

At the suggestion of Penn, the Governor of New York, in making peace with the Five Nations, extended it to the other English colonies; and on April 23, 1701, Penn made a treaty with the king of the Susquehanna Minquas or Conestoga Indians and three chiefs of the same, and with the king of the Shawanees and two chiefs of the same, and with the brother and agent of the emperor of the Onondagas of the Five Nations and certain chiefs of the Ganawese (Conoys) or Piscataways, then dwelling on the north bank of the Potomac; under this treaty the people of those tribes while living near Penn's government should have the privileges of his laws, they owning the authority of the Crown of England and of said government, and should not permit any strange Indians to settle on the western side of the Susquehanna or on the Potomac, nor any other Indians anywhere in the province without the Proprietary's consent, and no person should trade with these Indians without a license under the Proprietary's hand and seal, but the Potomac Indians could settle on any part of the Potomac river "within the bounds of this province." Moreover, the Conestoga Indians did ratify the sale which had been confirmed the year before by two of the Conestoga chiefs of lands about the Susquehanna, and guaranteed the good behavior of the Potomac Indians. In Evans's time the Ganawese, reduced in number by sickness, were allowed to remove to Tulpehocken, the Schuylkill Indians guaranteeing their good behavior. Penn submitted to the Assembly in August, 1701, a royal letter asking for £350 sterling as a contribution for erecting forts on the frontier of New York. The Assembly replied postponing the consideration in view of the great sums of money lately assessed in taxes and the arrears of quit rents, and asking Penn to represent the present conditions to the King, and assure him of their willingness to acquiesce in his commands as far as their religious persuasions would permit. Seven members from the Lower Counties signed an address, hoping that they would not be required to contribute for forts abroad before they were able to build any at home, they not being able to furnish themselves with arms and ammunition, "having consumed our small stocks in making tobacco."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Penn was called to England by a proposition in Parliament to annex all proprietary governments to the Crown. Another Assembly excused itself from complying with the request for contribution to the New York forts. A subscription was started for his benefit, to be collected by Samuel Carpenter. On October 28, 1701, he signed the Charter of Privileges under which the government of Pennsylvania and Delaware was carried on until the Revolution. It began with a declaration that no inhabitant confessing and acknowledging "one Almighty God, the Creator, Upholder and Ruler of the World," and professing himself obliged to live quietly under the civil government, should be molested or prejudiced because of conscientious persuasion or practice, nor compelled to do or suffer anything contrary to religious persuasion, and that all "who also profess to believe in Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the World," should be capable to serve the government in any capacity, they solemnly promising, when required, allegiance to the King and fidelity to the Proprietor and Governor, and taking certain attests. An Assembly was to be chosen annually on the first day of October, consisting of four persons from each county, or more at any time, as the Governor and Assembly should agree, to meet at Philadelphia on the fourteenth of that month, unless the Governor and Council—only twice was there any mention of a council in the document—should appoint another place, and to make laws to

LAN 1749 DV REGNE DE LOVIS XV ROY DE FRANCE NOVS CELORON COMMANDANT DVN IS DE TACHEMENT ENVOIE PAR MONSIEVR LE M^{re} DE LA GALISSONIERE COMMANDANT GENERAL DE LA
 NOUVELLE FRANCE POVR RETABLIR LA TRANQUILLITE
 DANS QUELQUES VILLAGES SAUVAGES DE CES CANTONS
 AVONS ENTERRE CETTE PLAQUE A L'ENTREE DE LA
 RIVIERE CHINODAHICETHA LE 18 AOUST PRES DE LA RIVIERE OYO AUTREMENT BELLE RIVIERE POVR MONVMENT DV RENOVVELLEMENT DE POSSESSION QUE NOVS AVONS PRIS DE LA DITTE
 RIVIERE OYO ET DE TOUTES CELLES QUI Y TOMBENT ET DE TOUTES LES TERRES DES DEUX COTES JVSQUE
 AUX SOURCES DES DITES RIVIERES QUI ONT
 JOUY OV DV JOUIR LES PRECEDENTS ROYS DE FRANCE ET QUILS SONT MAINTENVS PAR LES ARMES ET PAR LES TRAITTES SPECIALEMENT PAR CEUX DE RISVICK DVTRCHT ET DAIX LA CHEFELLE

Copy of one of Celeron's Leaden Plates

Engraved especially for this work from a print in possession of Dr. W. J. Holland

SUSPENSION AND RESTORATION

be confirmed by the Governor and to have all the other powers of an assembly usual in any of the King's plantations in America. On such election day the freemen should choose two persons to nominate for sheriff and two for coroner in each county, and the Governor should commission one of them for three years. The county justices should nominate three persons for clerk of the peace, and the Governor should commission one of them during good behavior. No person should be obliged to answer any matter relating to property except in the ordinary courts of justice, unless appeals should be appointed to the Governor and Council. No person should be licensed by the Governor to keep a house of public entertainment except those recommended by the justices of the county in open court, the said justices being empowered to forbid any person upon misbehavior from keeping one. The estate of a suicide should descend as if he had died a natural death, and there should be no forfeiture to the Governor upon any accidental killing. No law should change or diminish the effect of the charter except by consent of the Governor and six-sevenths of the Assembly, but the clause for liberty of conscience should remain without alteration inviolable forever. A postscript provided that if within three years from date, by the declaration of a majority of the representatives of either the province or the territories on the Delaware, both should no longer be united in one Assembly, each county in the province should have at least eight representatives and the town of Philadelphia two in future. On the same day a new charter, dated October 25, was signed for the city of Philadelphia, making Edward Shippen mayor; and a commission of property was issued to Edward Shippen, Griffith Owen, Thomas Story, and James Logan. Moreover, the Proprietary issued a commission bearing the same date as the charter of privileges to a new Council of State, consisting of Edward Shippen, John Guest, Samuel Carpenter, William Clark, Thomas Story, Griffith Owen, Phineas Pemberton, Samuel Finney, Caleb Pusey, and John Blunston.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

They were to consult and assist the Proprietary, if in the colony, and his deputy or Lieutenant-Governor, for the time being; and in case of the latter's decease or incapacity, to exercise all the powers, jurisdiction, and authority conferred upon Penn by the charter of King Charles. They were to hold office during the Proprietary's pleasure, and their number could be increased by

Washington's Hill

On this hill near Waterford, Washington camped while on his journey through the Allegheny Valley to investigate the French settlements in 1753. The French prevented his proceeding further. Photographed especially for this work by Hon. John P. Vincent the Lieutenant-Governor, who could choose the President, otherwise the first named should take the chair. On October 30, Penn introduced to the Council the Lieutenant-Governor whom he had chosen, Andrew Hamilton, who held the postoffice for the colonies, and had been Governor of New Jersey. David Lloyd prepared a charter of property, which was taken down to New Castle as Penn was embarking, October 31, and after some argument signed by him, with an order for Governor Hamilton to keep it, and have the great seal affixed, if he did not hear to the contrary within six months. In April, the vetoing notification came. Penn had sent after him 114 laws passed during his stay, to be submitted to the King for approval. It will be noticed that by the charter of Charles II the laws passed by the Proprietary and people could be made void by the King within six months after presentation to him if declared by the King in Council inconsistent with his sovereignty or lawful prerogative. As a matter of fact every law had to commend itself to those who had charge of trade and plantation affairs, and frequently half the work of a session of the Assembly had to be done over again to obviate the objections of those in London through whose hands it passed. The Proprietary was often blamed for the delay or failure in securing the allowance of an act. The laws which the first Proprietary had enacted during his second visit remained some time before the Attorney-General for want of a large fee. At last he reported them, and caused the rejection of a great many.

SUSPENSION AND RESTORATION

CHAPTER X.

PENN'S LIEUTENANT-GOVERNORS

THE first Proprietary was designed never to return, and Pennsylvania became the estate of an absent landlord, and the bailiwick of a deputy. In the choice of the latter, the titular Governor was rarely, if ever, fortunate. After the term of Thomas Lloyd a Quaker was never chosen, possibly because it was necessary for the Crown to confirm the appointment, and that the appointee should qualify by oath, and participate in military affairs. To persons of distinction, like some of the contemporary heads of neighboring colonies, the office was not an attractive one. The salary, in early times necessarily small, was never sufficient to tempt any one high in the world. The dignity of being lieutenant under a family of commoners was almost invisible to those who would have accepted a governorship directly under the Crown. The power, dependent at first upon an Assembly tenacious of its rights, became, as King and Proprietary added to their regulations, so circumscribed as to chafe upon any man of spirit. On the other hand, the responsibility might have been capital in the days when there was any doubt of the legality of Quaker courts trying for murder, and when the province must have been surrendered on demand because of the non-resistance of the population; and afterwards, when penal bonds came to be exacted for compliance with the orders of superiors, the responsibility was financially heavy.

PENN'S LIEUTENANT-GOVERNORS

Hamilton served about eighteen months, until his death, April 26, 1703, when the Council, with Edward Shippen as President, took his place. Hamilton, making proclamation of the declaration of war, exhorted his hearers to enlist, and soon afterwards appointed as captain of the Philadelphia company, George Lowther, a lawyer, of a good Yorkshire family. The drums beat through the town, but Lowther found at the field only a few, and those inconsequential people. Before the second muster, which was the last, the idea got abroad that these recruits were to be marched to Canada, and the anti-Quakers concluded that for them to form a militia was a sure way of enabling the Quakers to retain the government, as the impossibility of having a militia had been the chief argument in favor of depriving them.

The royal confirmation of Hamilton's appointment did not arrive before he died. The jail of Philadelphia being full of alleged murderers and felons, he appointed a special commission to try them; but the jurymen, from doubts of the validity of his acts, would not serve in a matter of life and death. The regular Provincial Court opened a few days afterwards. The Quaker judges were in the majority, and notwithstanding the protest of the other judges, who left the bench, and with another prosecuting attorney in place of John Moore, the Attorney-General, who refused, proceeded without either oath or affirmation by judge, jury, or witnesses, but with only the attest required by the provincial law. One woman was found guilty of murder, and sentenced to be hung, but Hamilton's illness prevented his signing the death warrant. A man was convicted of manslaughter, and burnt in the hand. The inhabitants not of Quaker views were frightened, as they felt themselves at the mercy of witnesses not restrained by reverence for an oath. Quarry, it appears, did his best to spread, if he did not start their fears. Penn in England defended the Quakers' course; said it was not to be expected that founding a new country they should have no more rights than they left in England, and should be obliged to withdraw from juries. Meanwhile an order from the Queen was being carried to Pennsylvania, requiring all persons in judicial or other office to take the oath directed by the law of England or the affirmation allowed by it to Quakers, and all persons who were in England obliged and willing to take an oath to be admitted to do so by the officers or judges in Pennsylvania and the lower counties, in default whereof their proceedings should be null and void. Penn advised his people to disregard this, as conflicting with the laws established by virtue of King Charles's charter.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The inhabitants of New Castle, Kent, and Sussex, not being of the sects opposed to taking oaths or bearing arms, were restive under Quaker control; but it was really at the motion of the Pennsylvania assemblymen that, in 1702, a separation in the legislature took place, and was permanent. Quarry urged the Lords of Trade to have those counties placed directly under the Crown, which had never granted to Penn the government of them; and he said that the only title Penn had to such government was the old act of union, which the people had been cajoled into passing. In subsequent history, the Assembly of these "lower counties" generally followed the wishes of the acting governor. By accident, which Quarry tortured into a design, there was no mention of the lower counties in the commission to the Council.

Of the three Lieutenant-Governors next in order, the first was dissolute; the second, deranged; and the third, dishonest. One beat the watchman, but is chiefly remembered for getting up a false alarm to scare the Quakers, another for kicking the judges at New Castle, and the last, the one of noble lineage, for sending young and poor Ben Franklin to London on the false promise of letters of credit. The first Proprietary, immediately on hearing of Hamilton's death, nominated the son, twenty-six years of age, of an old friend, and there was no delay in receiving the royal approbation, or in entering the security. A clause was inserted in his commission making void all laws he should enact without the personal assent of the Proprietary. This proviso the Council

Gedenke, Herr, an David und sein Liden, weil er die selbst geschworen hat, daß er Dir dienen will zu allen Zeiten

Specimen of Ephrata Cloister Music, 1754

Engraved for this work from original in the collection of J. F. Sachse

PENN'S LIEUTENANT-GOVERNORS

unanimously declared illegal without annulling the commission. Lieutenant-Governor John Evans arrived 12 mo. 2, 1703-4, in company with the Proprietary's oldest son, William Penn, Jr. The representatives of the people were nettled by Evans's attempt, which was futile, to bring about a reunion of the province and lower counties in Assembly, and by his asking a reconsideration of the refusal of the Assembly of Pennsylvania to contribute to the New York forts; so there began with the first Assembly a quarrel which embraced the Proprietary, as the latter, who had not yet received the taxes and gifts for his benefit, desired the people to come to his relief by assuming the support of all branches of the government, and asked moreover for the payment of the 200*l.* which he owed for Hamilton's salary. The Assembly, of which David Lloyd was Speaker, adjourned for weeks at a time on account of the fair, the harvests, etc.; and in the intervals, when for a few days there was a sitting, excused itself again from contributing to the forts in New York, and instead of levying taxes, passed laws for securing and confirming the privileges of itself and the city corporation, and the rights of private individuals. One of these bills did not receive Evans's consent, because it included the right of the Assembly to sit upon its own adjournment, and he was advised that Penn had never given up the power of prorogation and dissolution. Evans by proclamation declared void the proceedings of the courts where the Queen's order as to oaths had not been complied with, and so vice went unpunished. He organized a militia, promising to those who enlisted exemption from the duty of watch and ward, which the corporation of Philadelphia imposed upon the citizens. When some of the militiamen declined to watch, the constables, under order of their superiors, reported the names to the mayor's court, and, probably to the satisfaction of the Quakers, soldiering without pay being a thankless task, very few appeared at the next muster. Then by advice of the Council, the Lieutenant-Governor by proclamation repeated the exemption. One evening hard words were exchanged at a tavern between the militia officers and the watchmen, and the next night William Penn, Jr., was there when the watch came around, and assisted in beating off the custodians of the peace. The heir apparent was duly presented for the offense with his comrades; which he took in such high dudgeon that he soon went back to England, selling his manor, and so being able to face his creditors. Jenkins in his "Family of William Penn" points out that this was not the street brawl in which Evans was engaged, where the mayor, recorder, and Joseph Wilcox, an alderman, came to the assistance of the watchmen, and the Lieutenant-Governor, making himself known, was beaten by Wilcox more severely for having given such occasion for scandal. On this latter occasion Griffith Jones was mayor; on the former, Anthony Morris. He with his aldermen remonstrated that by the proclamation "many of the good people of the city were much discouraged." Evans replied: "Too many of those good people you mention are such as oppose a militia, not from any principle against it, but through an uneasiness to see anything done under the present administration that may recommend us and the Proprietor's affairs to the Crown." So the proclamation was not recalled. Just before the adjournment of the Assembly, a committee was appointed by it to address the Proprietary in plain terms. The result was the setting forth in a "most virulent, unmannerly invective," prepared by David Lloyd, of a number of complaints, beginning with clauses in the Governor's commission inconsistent with the charter and the negligence of Penn in procuring the royal assent to most necessary bills, and then proceeding to the injustice practiced by the surveyors, the office of Surveyor-General having been vacant since 1701, and the failure of the commissioners of property to give lands in exchange for those lost by adverse title. This was enclosed in a letter to Friends in England known to be enemies of Penn, asking them to oblige him to do justice, saying that the vilest of men were let into the judiciary, and speaking of "the condition this poor province is brought to by the late revels and disorders which young William Penn and his gang of loose fellows he accompanies with are found in." The writing of such a letter caused some little reaction; but the contest was continued by the Assembly elected after the address was written. In speaking of Evans, William Biles, member from Bucks county, whom Logan calls "that pestiferous old man," announced, "He is but a boy: he is not fit to be our Governor. We'll kick him out. We'll kick him out." Whereupon the indignant officer sued Biles for slander, and demanded that the Assembly expel him. This it declined to do; and accordingly it was dismissed, June 23, 1705. Owen, Pusey, and Hill of the Council prepared a letter to the Proprietary, declaring their abhorrence of Lloyd's paper, and assuring him of their readiness to support all the charge of government. It was signed by the great mass of the Friends, now stirred up in favor of their comrade and patron; and it was made effectual by an energetic political canvass, resulting in the choice of members of Assembly well affected towards the Proprietary, among them being Shippen, Carpenter, Pusey, and Hill of the Council. There was only one member not a Quaker. An act for the collection of quit-rents secured to Penn that source of income, and the appropriation of 800*l.* out of a 2½*d.* per l. tax and about 600*l.* from an impost on liquors settled the trouble about the Lieutenant-Governor's salary and the other public charges. A number of the laws rejected by the Queen were re-enacted, duly modified. The Pennsylvania method now used of suing out a mortgage was then put in the statute books.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

PENN'S LIEUTENANT-GOVERNORS

Franklin's device and motto published in the Pennsylvania Gazette at the time of the Albany Congress of the Colonies, 1754

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

There never was in Pennsylvania, during the colonial period, to our knowledge, any molestation or interruption of the liberty of Jews, Deists, or Unitarians, the first named, in fact, becoming well represented in Philadelphia, and at an early date, David Franks and others of them being taken into its fashionable circle; therefore it is interesting chiefly as an evidence how generally the Quakers in 1705 accepted Athanasian orthodoxy that, while the frame of government of 1701, as we have seen, guaranteed liberty of conscience to all who confessed and acknowledged "one Almighty God, the Creator, Upholder, and Ruler of the World," and made eligible for office all who believed in "Jesus Christ the Saviour of the World," the act concerning liberty of conscience passed by this Assembly having only one non-Quaker member, established as the religion of the land Christianity and belief in the Bible, by these words: "Almighty God being only Lord of conscience, author of all divine knowledge, faith, and worship, who can only enlighten the minds, and convince the understanding of people; in due reverence to His sovereignty over the souls of mankind; and the better to unite the Queen's Christian subjects in interest and affection, Be it enacted that no person now or at any time hereafter dwelling or residing within this Province who shall profess faith in God the Father and in Jesus Christ his only Son and in the Holy Spirit, one God blessed for evermore, and shall acknowledge the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be given by Divine inspiration, and when lawfully required shall profess and declare that they will live peaceably under the civil government, shall in any case be molested or prejudiced for his or her conscientious persuasion, nor shall he or she be at any time compelled to frequent or maintain any religious worship-place or ministry whatsoever contrary to his or her mind, but shall freely and fully enjoy his or her Christian liberty in all respects, without molestation or interruption." To anticipate, in Sir William Keith's time, Rev. Richard Welton, D. D., having come to Christ Church, Philadelphia, after receiving consecration as a bishop privately through the Scotch non-jurors, was threatened with molestation chiefly for political reasons; when he prayed for the King without naming George, so as to leave it open whether the Stuart was not the lawful sovereign, Keith shut up Christ Church, and Welton, summoned to England, went to Portugal, and died in Lisbon. When in Patrick Gordon's time, a Roman Catholic chapel was erected, that Lieutenant-Governor thought that the laws of Parliament required him to suppress it, but, there being no desire to do this, it was postponed pending a decision by the British government as to whether the immunity granted by Pennsylvania law did not protect the religious followers of the Pope. During the French war, official suspicion and popular feeling were strong against those who had the same religion as France, and after Braddock's defeat, a mob attacked the Roman Catholics in Philadelphia, but Quakers protected them.

PENN'S LIEUTENANT-GOVERNORS

Obtaining a verdict for 300*l.* against Biles, whom the Yearly Meeting also condemned for such language, Evans was appealed to by the Assembly to forgive him, and promised the committee to notify them if he had cause to do anything further; but Biles, coming to town on this assurance, the Lieutenant-Governor, after shaking hands with him, had him arrested, and notified the committee afterwards. The old man lay a month in jail, receiving every attention from "our good women," as Logan calls them; then Evans, finding no money was to be obtained, released Biles.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Evans forged a letter from the Governor of Maryland announcing that privateers were off the Virginia capes, and some days afterward arranged that John French of New Castle should come up to Philadelphia in great haste and apparent alarm to

James Hamilton

Member Provincial Assembly, 1734; mayor of Philadelphia, 1745; member Provincial Council, 1746; lieutenant-governor, 1748-1754, and again 1759-1763; president of the Council in 1771; also acting governor about two months in 1773 frighten the citizens with a tale that Lewes had been burnt and six French brigantines had bombarded the fort at New Castle, and were making up the river, it being hoped that sufficient Quakers would lose their presence of mind and respond to a call to arms to make apparent forever the inconsistency of the members of the Society of Friends. French fulfilled his part, and Evans spread the report, summoning those who would defend themselves. Some persons tried to send their goods out of town, and were actually fired upon by the militia. Half a dozen young Quakers shouldered their guns; but it being a Meeting day, the Meeting was held as usual, and the Quakers generally trusted in the Lord. Logan took a row boat down the river where he learned the truth, and, returning, quieted the people. Evans soon afterwards decided to call a special session of the Assembly, the councillors who were not Quakers declaring that he should throw upon it the responsibility for not defending the province. The Quaker councillors, themselves members of the House, expostulated; as those of their persuasion could only send a negative answer, there would be no other result than to injure them: they believed it a preliminary step to deprive the people of the constitution. The Assembly, of course, did not take any belligerent measures; the reply said, "We hope we are not in much danger, considering our remoteness from the sea and difficulty of access. * * * the Queen's colonies of Virginia and Maryland, which are far more ancient settlements than ours, have no fortifications we know of this day; therefore we hope that nothing shall prevail to render us more obnoxious to the Queen than our neighbors." Evans found the Assembly of the lower counties more to his mind. He permitted fines to be imposed upon those residing there who had scruples against military service, but were in the minority; which course was naturally resented by the majority in Pennsylvania. There was a fort at New Castle, and Evans consented to a law that every vessel going down the river should pay powder-money. The Quaker traders declared they would not comply, and gave orders to that effect to the masters of their vessels. In the spring of 1707 a sloop bound for Barbados was about to sail when the Lieutenant-Governor told the master that if he did not stop at New Castle, the vessel should be fired upon, and he made prisoner. The master reported this to Hill, the principal owner, who indignantly remonstrated with the Governor—a Lieutenant-Governor was popularly called "Governor"—and then went aboard the vessel, and in it proceeded down the river. The Governor had hurried to New Castle on horseback, and set a watch in the fort for the sloop. When the vessel came within range, the fort opened fire, but the sloop escaped uninjured, and, hotly pursued by boats, in one of which was the Governor, put over to Salem, New Jersey, carrying along John French, who had boarded it. There Hill placed himself under the protection of the Queen's flag; and Lord Cornbury, Governor of the Jerseys, arriving, and resenting the invasion of his jurisdiction as Admiral over Delaware bay and river, insisted upon the sloop being allowed to proceed on its voyage. This signal bravery of Richard Hill, who dared to stand fire, although he could not conscientiously return it, brought to the Quakers freedom from the imposition of which they complained. By not mentioning the Proprietary's design of selling the government, Logan had added to the ill will felt for him as the Proprietary's steward, and in the long course of contention on a bill to establish courts, when Logan advised that courts be re-established by Evans under the right granted to Penn by charter, the House declared Logan an enemy of the Governor and government and on February 26, 1706-7, presented articles of impeachment against him, which the Lieutenant-Governor decided he could not try.

PENN'S LIEUTENANT-GOVERNORS

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

After the death of Philip Ford, his widow and three children claimed the province and territories under the old deed to him, maintaining that since April 1, 1700, Penn had been only tenant at will, and they brought suit for £2,000 arrears of rent, filed a bill in chancery, and petitioned the Queen to put them in possession and take to herself the government. Penn offered the payment of one-half with security for the other half of what should be found on adjusting accounts, and proposed a reference to members of the Society of Friends mutually chosen. This being refused he appealed to the Meeting which the family attended, which on 10 mo. 26, 1705, admonished and disowned them. Isaac Norris went to England the next year, and labored for a compromise, while attempts were made to raise money for Penn, who wrote that if friends in Pennsylvania would give £5,000, he would come and live among them. William Penn Jr., agreeing to have the estate at Worminghurst sold, it brought enough to clear all debts but that to the Fords; and the son was reconciled to his father, who, looking for a new Lieutenant-Governor, thought of appointing him, but Norris advised against it. A verdict was obtained against William Penn for the rent, etc., £3,000, which his friends insisted that he should not pay, as certain members of the Society had, on examination, reported that the Fords were entitled only to £4,303 instead of £14,000. On 11 mo. 7, bailiffs came for him at Meeting, but Henry Gouldney and Herbert Springett induced them not to take him out of the gallery by promising that he would come in a few hours, which he did, and then turned himself over to the Fleet. The Lord Chancellor, to whom the Queen referred the petition, said that Penn had an equity of redemption in the land, and that his powers of government were not pledged. Finally a compromise was effected. The Fords accepted £7,600, and executed a release, Penn leaving the Old Bailey. Henry Gouldney and seven other Englishmen, among them Penn's father-in-law Callowhill, furnished £6,600 of the money, and to them Penn and his heir apparent executed a mortgage dated Oct. 7, 1708, of Pennsylvania and the lower counties, and all purchase money due and quit rents in arrears or to fall due, Pennsbury and some tracts being excepted, and with power in the mortgagees to sell land if the principal were not repaid in two years with 6 per cent. interest, meanwhile Penn and his son to have power to convey clear.

PENN'S LIEUTENANT-GOVERNORS

Charles Gookin, a respectable army officer, assumed the duties of Lieutenant-Governor on February 2, 1708-9, instructed by Penn not to pass any laws without the approbation of the Council. The Assembly urged him to disregard this, as he was acting in place of William Penn, who with the Assembly had all the powers of legislation, and it furthermore blamed Logan for most of the disagreement between the Lieutenant-Governors and the people, and more than once remonstrated against Logan's continuance in the Council. Logan replied in an exposure of Lloyd. Upon receipt of an order from the Queen for the province to furnish 150 men as part of a force of 1,500 against Canada, and for which Gookin asked 4,000*l.*, the Assembly refused to pay "money to hire men to fight and kill one another," but out of gratitude to the Queen

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Old Shawanee Church

Site of Fort Dupui, about five and one-half miles from Stroudsburg, on the Delaware river. The fort was probably built earlier than 1755. From a sketch made especially for this work voted to her 500*l.* and appropriated 300*l.* for all necessary expresses and other public charges. In October, 1709, Hill was chosen mayor of the city, and the influence of the corporation was turned in favor of the Proprietary. As to Logan's charges against Lloyd, an investigating committee reported to the Assembly that Logan had refused to bring proof. He was then preparing to embark for England, but on the 25th of November, the House ordered the sheriff of Philadelphia county to attach his body, and detain him in the county jail until he should make satisfaction for his reflections on sundry members. The sheriff refused to obey, but it was feared that some of the members themselves would make the arrest; so the Governor was obliged to interpose his protection, and Logan sailed a few days afterwards. The next election sent an entirely new set of men to the Assembly. It voted 2,000*l.* to the Queen's use. Hill was Speaker during the session and the next, as also in 1716, and was in the Assembly continuously until 1721. We must recognize him as a political leader who did most to preserve Quaker and Proprietary ascendancy in his day. During his last term as mayor and Speaker, Lieutenant-Governor Gookin charged him with disaffection to King George, and said the only occasion of difference between them was that Gookin would not agree to Hill's project of proclaiming the Pretender. The Assembly went into committee of the whole on this charge, and communicated with the Lieutenant-Governor, and held several meetings; but Gookin, whose conduct on many occasions betokened a disordered mind, replied that he was not obliged to render to the House any reasons for his accusation, but would do so to the Board at home. He said he believed in his conscience that the Speaker was in favor of the Pretender; but further than this gave the members no satisfaction. The House accordingly declared the charges without foundation, adding that the Lieutenant-Governor, having approved of Hill to be Speaker, should in justice to the Assembly give grounds for the charge, or clear him of the imputation. After William Keith became Lieutenant-Governor, Gookin was again asked for his reasons, the new official being unwilling to have any one in his Council who was believed disloyal, but nothing further was elicited. Logan, too, was included in the charge, the investigation, and the acquittal. His real sentiments were expressed in a letter to Hannah Penn, urging that Gookin be removed and his place filled by Colonel Keith, who, he says, might labor under the suspicion of being a Jacobite, and so fail to be commissioned: "But as these distinctions cannot affect us, who want nothing but peace under the Crown of England, and have no power either to advance or retard any interest, all our views, or rather wishes, are to have a person over us who may truly pursue the interest of the country."

PENN'S LIEUTENANT-GOVERNORS

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

William Penn finally in 1712 came to an agreement with the Crown for the sale to it of his rights of government for £12,000, of which £1,000 were paid to him on account.

Keith was not closely, if at all, related to the ex-Quaker George Keith, but was the son of a Scotch baronet, and succeeded to that rank, but to no estate, while Lieutenant-Governor. This administration began May 31, 1717, and lasted nine years.

On May 31, 1718, while the enlightened legislator William Penn was still alive, but having been for about six years mentally unfit for business, although occasionally signing his name, the Assembly passed "an act for the advancement of justice and more certain administration thereof," extending the severity of certain acts of Parliament to the colony; for instance, any person committing a robbery by assaulting another on or near the highway, putting him in fear, and taking from his person money or other goods to any value whatsoever, and even the counsellors, aiders, comforters, and abettors of such robber, should suffer as felons according to the statutes in such cases provided in Great Britain; any person cutting off or disabling a limb or member, or counselling, aiding, or abetting such act, should suffer death; any person breaking into a dwelling house at night to commit a felony should suffer death; any person burning a barn or an out-house having corn or hay therein should suffer death. The act, being approved by the King in Council, confirmed finally the right of judges, jurymen, and witnesses to qualify themselves according to their conscientious persuasion respectively by taking either a corporal oath or the affirmation allowed by act of Parliament for Quakers.

At this time, the white population of Penn's dominion was, it is estimated, about 40,000, one-fourth of whom lived in Philadelphia. About one-half belonged to the Society of Friends.

CHAPTER XI.

THE CLAIM OF THE HEIR-AT-LAW

UPON the death of William Penn, July 30, 1718, various legal questions arose as to the governorship. His will, dated in 1712, had devised it to two noblemen in trust to sell to the Crown or other person; and his own agreement for its sale to the Crown was still undisposed of. Subject to these arrangements, and except so far as required for these purposes, to whom did the powers of government go? All lands, tenements and hereditaments in America, after sale of sufficient to pay debts, and with the exception of 40,000 acres, were to be conveyed by certain trustees, Hannah Penn, Thomas Callowhill, Margaret Lowther, Gilbert Heathcote, Samuel Waldenfield, John Field, Henry Gouldney, Samuel Carpenter, Richard Hill, Isaac Norris, Samuel Preston, and James Logan, to the children of his second wife in such shares and for such estates as she should appoint. She, in November, 1718, reserving a power to revoke and alter, appointed one-half in fee to her son John Penn, he paying £1,500 to his sister Margaret, and the other half in fee jointly to the younger sons, Thomas, Richard, and Dennis. The heir-at-law, however, was William Penn Jr. child of the first wife, and provided for by the estate in Ireland, but now raising the question, could the governorship, being of the nature of an hereditary title and jurisdiction be assigned or devised away from the heir-at-law? William Penn Jr. therefore issued a new commission to Keith, which arrived in April, 1719, and which Keith and the Council were willing to publish, but the Assembly thought this unnecessary, as a law of the province authorized the Lieutenant-Governor to hold over. The Crown sent an order to Keith to continue until the Proprietor and the trustees should adjust their differences.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The muse of history has not taken the heir-at-law under her protection, certainly not the muse recognized by the Quakers. The son of a great father often figures as the latter's antithesis. William Penn Jr. may not have been great; he is to be classified among the unfortunates, rather than the unworthy. About the time he came of age, his father's circumstances required the first wife's children to consent to the sale of property which came to them from her. The conduct in Pennsylvania which enabled the father's enemies to speak of "the disorders of young William Penn" and his "gang of loose fellows" is not proved by such strong language to have included any moral delinquencies. He had kept "top company," that is, associated with his equals in worldly rank, before he came, and he unsuccessfully ran for Parliament after he went back to England. / The following words in the instructions which he sent with his commission do not sound like those of an irreligious, dissolute, or narrow minded lordling: "If you can procure a militia to be settled by law, slip not the occasion of doing it, but as that country was chiefly at first settled by Quakers I would not have them oppressed on any account. / Protect the people under your care in all the rights, privileges, and liberties my father granted them by charter or otherwise or that they ought to enjoy as Englishmen. Observe the law for liberty of conscience, which I take to be a fundamental one in Pennsylvania, and was one great encouragement for the Quakers to transport themselves thither, and to make it what it now is, for which they merit the favor of my family as well as on many other accounts, and shall always have it when in my power; and this I desire you will let the people know. But as I profess myself to be a member of the Church of England, therefore I recommend it to you to be careful of her interest, and that you encourage and protect the clergy and employ where you can deserving members of that communion, for I think they ought to have at least an equal share in the administration of public offices with their neighbors of other persuasions. Discountenance all Anti-Trinitarians and libertines. Protect in their possessions such strangers as are

CLAIM OF THE HEIR-AT-LAW

Richard Penn

Proprietary and titular governor of Pennsylvania and the counties of New Castle, Kent and Sussex, on the Delaware river; born 1706; died 1771. From an old painting settled amongst us, for the public faith is concerned in it." His career was cut short by death at the age of thirty-nine from consumption. He left three children, Springett, William, and a daughter. It was the claim of Hannah Penn, the first Proprietary's widow and executrix of his will, that the right to the government should be deemed legally converted into cash and therefore personal estate, of which after payment of the debts she was legatee for her and her children's benefit.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

In the fall of 1718, Sassoonan, king of the Delaware Indians, with a number of his followers, came to Philadelphia with the idea that they had not been paid for their lands, but Logan produced to them in the presence of the Council, a great number of deeds by which they were convinced; accordingly, Sassoonan and six chiefs executed a release, dated September 17, all but two making their marks before Lieutenant-Governor Keith, and afterwards the two making theirs before Logan. Acknowledging that their ancestors and predecessors had conveyed to William Penn in fee all the land, and had received the price, and in further consideration of a free gift of two guns, etc., from his commissioners, these Indians released all the land between the Delaware and the Susquehanna from Duck creek (in Delaware) to the mountains (the South mountain) on this side of Lechay (by the Lehigh river).

Much trouble arising between the northern and southern Indians, involving, moreover, injuries to the traders among them, the authorities of Pennsylvania endeavored to restrain the four tribes between the colony and the Alleghanies, viz.: the Susquehannas, Shawanees, Conoys, and Delawares, and made the hard request of them not to go to war on the first or second provocation of their people being killed, but only after the third provocation; and, moreover, told them not to receive the Five Nations, whose habitations were north and west of the Alleghanies, if coming to them on the way to or from war; and then expatiated upon how shameful a thing it was to torture prisoners—that it was not manly for people to use all their contrivance of torture and pain to put an unfortunate creature of their own shape and kind to death, whereas, if the English in a just (!) war killed their enemies, it was like men in the battle, and, if they took prisoners, they treated them kindly, until the King gave orders to send them back to their own country; they did not burn, pinch, or slash a poor man who could not defend himself, and the Indians must stop doing so. The Five Nations, however, generally forced the young bucks to accompany them on their raids, and some of the Cayugas asserted that all the land on the Susquehanna belonged to them and intimated that they might come to Philadelphia and demand possession. To meet deputies of the Five Nations, Keith went to Conestoga in the summer of 1721, and in their presence informed their tributaries, the Indians east of the Alleghanies, of the condition he had made for the latter with the Governor of Virginia, viz.: not to hunt on the eastern side of those mountains south of the Potomac; upon which terms the Governor of Virginia had agreed that his Indians should not cross the Potomac or the Alleghanies. Keith told the deputies of the Five Nations, whose speaker was Ghesaont, a Seneca, that the English had now, by peace among themselves, become a great nation in America, far exceeding in number the Indians, who were continuing to make war upon one another, as if they intended that none of their race should be left alive; if the Five Nations would still go out to destroy and be destroyed for nothing, let them take another path; the Indians of Pennsylvania would not be allowed to go out. Then he gave Ghesaont a gold coronation medal of George I, to take as a token of friendship to the greatest chief of the Five Nations, Kannygoodk. To James Logan, who continued the conference after Keith left, Ghesaont acknowledged the Susquehanna country to have been conveyed to William Penn. Owing to the killing of a Seneca, who, when drunk and applying for rum, was knocked down, there were sent calico shirts, silk stockings, silk garters, and silk handkerchiefs to the sachems of the Five Nations, and Keith, with four of his councillors, went to Albany, and made a treaty of peace, in September, 1722, the Five Nations acknowledging that Penn's Governors and people had always honestly kept his treaties of love and kindness, and finally asking that those concerned in the death of the Seneca be set at liberty, and, moreover, surrendering the lands about Conestoga, desiring them to be settled by Christians. At the same time, Governor Spotswood, of Virginia, made a treaty, and secured the assent of the

CLAIM OF THE HEIR-AT-LAW

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Five Nations and the Tuscaroras to the proposed boundary within which the Virginia Indians should be safe. Any of the Five Nations, or any Tuscarora, Conestoga, Shawanee, Octatiguanann-kroon, or Ostagle passing without a passport from the Governor of his province southward of the Potomac, i. e., its southern branch, or eastward of the mountains, should be put to death or transported into slavery.

During Keith's administration the Scotch-Irish and the Germans began to pour into Pennsylvania. The former, whose history is given in Hanna's work on the subject, first settled in the southern part of what was then Chester county, which the boundary dispute made no man's land, and which was so near the port of New Castle; then they advanced to the regions marked by the oldest Presbyterian churches south of the Schuylkill. The first company of Germans were invited by Keith to come from Æsopus, in New York State, and establish themselves at Tulpehocken. In Gordon's time others, including Conrad Weiser, made the same migration.

In the difficult position of choosing between two masters, viz. : the Proprietary, represented chiefly by Logan, and the people, represented by the Assembly, Keith determined to serve the latter, the power which voted the money for his support; therefore he was better paid than his predecessors, and succeeded, where they had failed, in establishing a Court of Chancery, held by the Lieutenant-Governor and the six senior councillors. This was the only separate court of chancery which Pennsylvania has ever had. Two important laws enacted by him survive, that of the party wall and that of the feme sole trader. The rate of interest on money was reduced from 8 to 6 per cent. In 1723 the first paper money was issued in Pennsylvania, and purely as an expansion of the currency demanded by the populace in the face of the few rich men. The method of emission was a novel one, often subsequently resorted to. The bills, made legal tender, were issued to applicants as a loan upon mortgage of their real estate, to be repaid in annual instalments, with 5 per cent. interest. Certain persons appointed in the act passed by the Assembly, and styled Commissioners of the Loan Office, attended to this, lending not more than 200*l.*, nor less than 20*l.* The interest was applicable to the expenses of government. Although the experience of other colonies with paper money had been unhappy, the Lords Commissioners of Trade and Plantations, out of consideration for those holding the bills, allowed the act and one subsequently passed for issuing 30,000*l.* to remain unrepealed by the King. When Sir William Keith's administration closed the colony was in a flourishing condition, and the discount on the bills diminishing. For twenty years afterwards the expenses of government required no direct tax, the interest on the mortgages and an excise being sufficient.

CLAIM OF THE HEIR-AT-LAW

Relics from Dunbar's Camp, 1775

Engraved for this work from the originals in Carnegie Museum, Pittsburgh

Charging Logan with an unauthorized entry upon his minutes as secretary of the Council, Keith removed Logan from that office. Logan was mayor of Philadelphia in 1723, and at the close of his term, went abroad to consult with Hannah Penn, and, suggesting to tie Keith's hands rather than remove him, obtained instructions from her to Keith to reinstate Logan as secretary, and, as has been said, "to be ruled by him." The Lieutenant-Governor was to obey the Council in his messages and speeches to the Assembly and in his legislative acts. Highly indignant, and feeling safe in his tenure of office—because, at that time, no branch of the family could confer on a new Lieutenant-Governor an undisputed commission—Keith refused to be trammelled. He sent Hannah Penn a reply, reminding her how the Council, in Evans's time, had unanimously decided that a clause in the Lieutenant-Governor's commission, forbidding him to pass any law without the consent of the Proprietary, was void, the charter vesting legislation in the acting Governor and Assembly; if, therefore, the Proprietary could not exercise control directly, he could not do so by means of a Council not recognized by the fundamental law. Keith also contended that he had a right to appoint a clerk of his Council in whom he had confidence, and he declined to reappoint Logan. More than this, Keith, to make a party for himself, violated his confidential relations with the Penns by communicating to the Assembly both the instructions and his reasons for disregarding them. He received the thanks of the House, David Lloyd appearing as his strong supporter; and there followed a pamphlet, or broadside, war concerning the Assembly's powers; meanwhile, the Penns abroad resolved upon Keith's removal. For a time, Keith seemed able to have wrested the government from them; but as rumors reached the colony of the appointment of a successor, the Assembly deserted him.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

William Penn Jr. having died in 1720, his heir was his son, Springett Penn.

Patrick Gordon, major in the army, then in the 62d year of his age, arrived in June, 1726, with a commission from Springett Penn, in which Hannah Penn concurred, and which the Crown confirmed. Pursuant to instructions, Gordon in a few days restored Logan to the secretaryship. Keith, who had a country seat in Horsham township (now in Montgomery county), then in Philadelphia county, which was afterwards known as Græme

CLAIM OF THE HEIR-AT-LAW

Park, was chosen a member of the Assembly that fall, and canvassed for the speakership, but David Lloyd allowed himself to be the candidate of Keith's enemies, and was elected, Sir William getting only three votes. Sir William was reelected to the Assembly in 1727, but before his term was out, after much talk about the abolition of all proprietary governments, and boldly declaring it his object to force the Penn family to sell the government to the Crown, whence he expected to be reappointed, he suddenly left the colony to avoid his private creditors. He passed the rest of his life in Great Britain, some of it in the debtor's prison, wrote many essays, and suggested the imposition on Americans of stamp duties by act of parliament, to provide a military force for the defense of the colonies. As a means of livelihood, he designed writing a history of the various colonies, but published one of Virginia only. He died in the Old Bailey in 1749. His wife, in considerable want, died in Philadelphia in 1741, and was buried in Christ Church yard.

At the accession of Gordon, who served until his death, there was a flourishing iron industry, great quantities of hemp were grown, and silk was raised "as fine and good," he was credibly informed, "as most of the world affords." To that means of employing "even the mean and weak" he urged the representatives of the people, about three years later, when, from competition by the cheaper labor of Russia, the English market for American iron was impaired. In 1729 the exchange between the paper money of the province and sterling was about 50 per cent. The Assembly, in addressing the Proprietaries, agreed unanimously to declare that as the quit rents were to be paid in English money or the value thereof in coin current, it must always be understood that an English shilling, the common quit rent for 100 acres, could only be discharged by such a shilling or its real value in the coin then passing. Under this straightforward and respectable official, politics became tranquil. He agreed to more than one act to issue paper money, some of which was applied to the building of the State House in Philadelphia, finished about 1734, largely under the direction of Andrew Hamilton, member and long Speaker of the Assembly and Attorney-General. Hamilton's design was adopted in preference to that of Dr. John Kearsley, who was instrumental in the building of Christ Church, started some years before. Hamilton, who is not known to have been a relation or connection, but only a friend, of the former Lieutenant-Governor of the same name, was the great lawyer of the province at this time, and was long celebrated for his defense of the liberty of the press in the person of the printer Zenger, tried for libel in New York in 1735. Gordon also agreed to an act for the purpose, long contended for, of enabling religious societies of Protestants to purchase land for burying grounds, churches, houses of worship, schools, etc., which confirmed the trusts for such religious societies as should, on June 1, 1730, have been in possession for twenty-one years. At his suggestion Ferdinand John Paris was appointed the province's agent in London, chiefly for securing the King's allowance of the laws.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

About 1729 a large number of the Shawanees left their settlement on the west side of the Susquehanna, near Paxtang, or Paxton, and moved to the Allegheny, then called the Ohio, where they had more room to rove, but where, unhappily, they were accessible to the French.

Lancaster county was set apart from Chester in 1729, and permitted to elect four members of the Assembly. Richard Hill died in 1730, and David Lloyd, after being Chief Justice a number of years, in 1731. For some years afterwards there was no lawyer on the supreme bench. Isaac Norris declining the chief justiceship, Logan held it from Lloyd's death until 1739, although between Lieutenant-Governor Gordon's death and Lieutenant-Governor Thomas's arrival, the second and third justices, Jeremiah Langhorne and Dr. Thomas Græme, held the sessions.

In Gordon's time the Penn family adjusted the differences between the branches. Young Dennis Penn having died at the close of 1722, Hannah Penn made another deed of appointment January 7, 1725, giving 500 acres, in addition to some charges on John's share, to her daughter Margaret, and one-half of the proprietary rights to John in fee, and the other half to Thomas and Richard jointly in fee. The widow of the first Proprietary died on December 20 following the commissioning of Gordon. In July of the next year a decree was obtained in the Court of Exchequer confirming William Penn's will. The mortgage of 1708 was gradually paid off; by April, 1724, only one-fourth remained due; on January 14, 1729, it was finally released, as paid in full. Springett Penn died February 8, 1731, leaving as his heir his brother William, the ancestor of the Penn-Gaskell and Hall families now (1903) extant. This William, with his mother and sister and aunt, uniting the entire claim of the descendants of the first Proprietary by his first wife, granted and released in fee the soil, except particular properties, and the government to John Penn, Thomas Penn, and Richard Penn, John taking one-half, according to his mother's appointment, Thomas taking one-fourth, and John and Thomas taking Richard's one-fourth in trust for him. The release was dated September 23, 1731, and the consideration to William was £5,500, and Earl Powlett, surviving trustee to sell the government, was directed to convey his legal title to the new Proprietaries. The cloud on the title was removed by a deed of the earl's son and successor in 1743.

CLAIM OF THE HEIR-AT-LAW

CHAPTER XII.

THE TIME OF JOHN PENN "THE AMERICAN"

JOHNN PENN, the eldest son of the founder of Pennsylvania by his second wife, Hannah Callowhill, has been called "the American," because he alone of all the Penn family, except possibly one child of his nephew Richard, was born in the New World. He was born in the "slate-roof house" in Second street (covered by the present Corn Exchange), Philadelphia, on Jan. 29, 1699-1700. For fifteen years, counting from the release executed by his step-nephew, he was recognized as the head of the Governors-in-chief of Pennsylvania, being older than his colleagues, Thomas and Richard, and having twice as much interest as either of them in the property. Before the more active brother, Thomas Penn, made his visit to Pennsylvania, an agreement was entered into by the three Proprietaries to preserve the estate to their heirs male. They covenanted, by articles dated May 8, 1732, that on the death of any one of them leaving male issue under age, the survivors could sell land during the minority, and that none of the three would dispose of his share, except to create charges upon it, otherwise than to his eldest son in tail male, with remainder to his other sons successively in order of birth in tail male, and if any of the three should die without male issue, his estate, subject to charges, should go to the survivors, as he might appoint. At this time only Richard was married, his wife being Hannah, daughter of John Lardner, a physician; and only one son had yet appeared to gratify the desire for establishing a family. In less than fifty years the lordship over Pennsylvania was gone; and the name died out with the last breath of a lunatic clergyman in 1869.

JOHN PENN THE AMERICAN

Thomas Penn arrived at Chester, Pa., on August 11, 1732, and the next day Gordon and all his councillors who could stand the trip, and a large number of gentlemen, went down to meet him. After dinner they escorted him to Philadelphia, the members of the city corporation meeting him with a congratulatory speech by the recorder. Thomas Penn brought from England six japanned and gilt guns for the respective chiefs of the Six Nations, presenting them at a treaty held in the month he arrived, when the Six Nations were asked to take the Shawanees under their protection, and induce them to return from the Ohio. He gave another gun to the Shawanee chief, who came to renew friendship in October, but announced that those on the Ohio would stay where they were. Thomas Penn took precedence at the council board over the Lieutenant-Governor, but left the administration of the government to the latter, concerning himself chiefly with the care of property, including Indian affairs. In the course of time he established himself in a manor house on what was left of the old manor of Springettsbury in the Northern Liberties of Philadelphia. In 1734 John Penn came to the country of his birth, but remained only a year, and the Assembly made him an address, September 20, 1735, in anticipation of his departure, saying: "That humility, justice, and benevolence which has appeared in thy conduct since thy arrival here has very deservedly gained thee the esteem and affection of the people."

Pennsylvania began to be the field for missionary labors like Whitefield's, and the scene of various religious movements like that of the New Side among Presbyterians, etc. The Schwenkfelders arrived in Philadelphia from Bethelsdorf and Goerlitz in the fall of 1734, settling in Bucks and Philadelphia counties. With them was the first Moravian evangelist who came to America, George Böhmsch, sent by Count Ludwig Zinzendorf, who himself, after several colonists belonging to that Unitas had arrived, spent a short time here in 1742 and 1743. The settlement of Bethlehem was begun in 1742.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

During Gordon's time only two cases, and those by consent of the parties, had been brought to a decree before the Court of Chancery, but in 1735 the people, at the instigation it was said of Hamilton, were stirred up against it, as requiring heavy fees and attendance of persons in Philadelphia, and as making the Proprietaries' deputy and friends in the Council possible judges of cases in which the Proprietaries might be a party; whereas the charter of 1701 had stipulated that no person should be obliged to answer in any matter relating to property before the Governor and Council, or in any other place but in the ordinary courts of justice, unless appeals thereunto should be appointed by law. So the Assembly, during that winter, resolved that the court as then constituted was contrary to the charter. During an adjournment, leaving a bill for a court of equity undisposed of, Patrick Gordon died, August 5, 1736, and was buried the next day in Christ Church, near his wife, who had died less than two years before.

The Council succeeded to the Lieutenant-Governor's powers, except those of legislation, Logan, on account of his lameness and residence out of town at Stenton (Twenty-second Ward, Philadelphia), offering to decline his share as eldest councillor if the other members should think of some one of themselves more proper, but they requested that he would act as President. In October, 1736, a larger number of Indians than had ever before appeared at a treaty—Senecas, Onondagas, Cayugas, Oneidas, and Tuscaroras—after being entertained three nights at Stenton, held a treaty in the great meeting house at Fifth and Arch streets, with Thomas Penn and the Council, and reported that they had made alliance with six other nations, who now acknowledged them as elder brothers. Then a sale was made to the Proprietaries of all right to the land embraced in the present counties of York, Adams, and Cumberland, and in that part of Franklin, Dauphin, and Lebanon southeast of the Kittatinny, or Blue, Mountains, and in that part of Berks, Lehigh, and Northampton not already possessed. The goods which served as a consideration for so much of the purchase as lay east of the Susquehanna were delivered at the time, but those for the land on the other side of the river were retained at the Indians' desire, and were finally delivered in 1742. This purchase as to the lands of the Delawares and other tributaries of the Six Nations was rather in the nature of the release of a feudal

JOHN PENN THE AMERICAN

Ralston or Brown Fort, Northampton County

Built about 1755. From a sketch made especially for this work lordship, concomitant with the buying out of the vassal's interest. Although the Six Nations said the Delawares had no lands to sell, the Proprietaries depended for quiet enjoyment upon the old deeds from these earlier owners. Among them, apparently, was one made in 1686, of which Thomas Penn had found a copy calling for a dimension "as far as a man can go in a day and a half" and thence to the river and down the courses thereof. In anticipation of completing the lines, the Proprietaries' agents hunted out the fastest woodsmen, to make the day and a half's journey, and had them as a preliminary taken over the ground, spending nine days while the trees were duly blazed. Some Indians did not wish the line measured, but others had a treaty with Thomas Penn on August 25, 1737, and agreed that it should be by a walk, for which, as we see, he was prepared. On September 12, in presence of some Indians and some whites on horseback, three young men started at sunrise from the line near the Wrightstown Meeting House in Bucks County to walk northwestwardly, and proceeded at such a pace that one gave out in a few hours, never afterwards recovering his health. The other two by nightfall reached the north side of the Blue Mountains. At sunrise they resumed. One of them fell into a creek, was taken up blind, and died in three days. The last at noon threw himself at full length on the ground and grasped a sapling, which was then declared to mark the distance called for by the purchase, viz. : how far a man could go in a day and a half. Yet Scull, the surveyor-general in 1757, swore that he, with Eastburn, the surveyor-general at the time, was present, and the men did not run, but walked fairly. Those who defended the transaction rather scoffed at the notion of the Indians that the journey was to be made naturally, taking a shot at game, or sitting down to smoke a pipe. Let the reader say whether sixty miles is the distance a man can go on foot in a day and a half? That one man out of three did it, and lived, was the evidence for the side of a triangle of which the northern point was between the present towns of Milford and Shohola in Pike county. Other objections were made by the Indians in 1757, viz. : that the original deed was fictitious, that the walk should have been along the Delaware river, and that, even if the walk was in the right direction, and not too long, then the line from it should not have been at right angles to it, but to the nearest point of the river. These objections, however, were held to be groundless, but there seems to have been another, which probably was sufficient to reprobate this long notorious "Walking Purchase;" the chiefs who could dispose of a reasonable distance around Wrightstown had no ownership across the Lehigh.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

JOHN PENN THE AMERICAN

Perhaps it would have been better for the United States of America if Lord Baltimore's largest claim had been acceded to by the Crown of England; in other words if, instead of the small strip now called Delaware being independent of the circumscribed region finally allowed to Maryland, there had been one large colony, eventually a state, extending from Virginia to the 40th parallel of latitude and from Delaware bay and river to the longitude of the head of the Potomac. In the Colonial and Revolutionary period, Delaware afforded another set of offices for Pennsylvania's public men; afterwards it was in political sympathy with Maryland. On American principles, neither of the adjoining States should have had the additional votes in the United States Senate. Had the 40th parallel been Pennsylvania's southern boundary, and so the greater part of the land covered by Philadelphia county, nearly all that of Delaware, and half that of the counties of Chester, Lancaster and York, etc., been given to Maryland; yes, and even at the same time had the claim of Connecticut over the region north of the 41st parallel been allowed, there still would have been sufficient land for the descendants of Admiral Penn to satisfy his pecuniary claim against the British government, and as a reward for his naval victories, and the more hemmed in the Quaker colony, and the stronger that of Maryland, the less would the non-resistant population of the former have been harassed to take measures for defence. But Philadelphia would have been where Pennsbury was. Charles II and his brother James believed that the grant by "the Royal Martyr," their father, to Cecilius Calvert, had not operated upon that country which the Dutch were occupying when they surrendered New York and its dependencies; and this was the important question in the mind of every Lord Baltimore, for, while it left him a contention as to how far south that occupation extended, yet, if the view of these monarchs was correct, there was no room for him on the Delaware river. As to the back country, James II gave him "to the 40th degree," making an order in Council Nov. 13,

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

1685, upon report to that effect of the Lords of Committee for Trade and Plantations, that the Peninsula between Delaware and Chesapeake Bay be divided equally by a line extending northwardly to the 40th degree, and all west of it be adjudged to Lord Baltimore, and all east of it to the King. Penn having appeared before the Council as the King's agent, it was claimed afterwards

George Croghan

Indian trader; settled near the site of Harrisburg as early as 1746; captain in Braddock's expedition 1755; settled near Pittsburgh after the French evacuation; became a large land owner, and subsequently took a prominent part in public affairs. Photographed especially for this work from a print in possession of Dr. W. J. Holland that James's intention was to take the land east of the line in trust for the confirmation of his deeds when Duke of York to Penn; but no patent followed. The Proprietary of Pennsylvania, with no muniment of title to the Lower Counties except the deeds of 1682, conveying the Duke of York's rights, royalty, etc., along with the soil thereof, was recognized by William and Mary as having the government of those territories as well as of the Province up the river; but Lord Baltimore several times tried to have the order of 1685 rescinded, and every time the Proprietary of Pennsylvania applied for the confirmation of his appointment of a Lieutenant-Governor, a declaration was made that such confirmation as to the Territories, or Lower Counties, should not be construed as establishing any right thereto in the applicant, and the order of approval was often made to read "and of said three Counties of New Castle, Kent and Sussex during His Majesty's royal will and pleasure only." After Gordon was approved of, Lord Baltimore on one side and the Earl of Sunderland on the other, made application for a royal grant of the government. The terms of the decree of 1685 recognized Penn's title to the soil at least of the Lower Counties, and to the soil and government of what is now Delaware county and the lower part of Philadelphia county. As to the back country, if the line of the Maryland patent ran to the 40th parallel of latitude, the northeastern corner of that colony and state would have been fixed by accurate mathematicians at a point northeast of the present Coatesville, so that York, Hanover, Gettysburg, Chambersburg, McConnellsburg, etc., would never have been Pennsylvania towns. But contrary to what we would suppose, the expression "the fortieth degree" appears to have meant the beginning of that degree, in other words, the 39th parallel. Evidently the officials of King Charles II. so understood it, for they passed the charter to Penn calling for the beginning of the 40th degree as his southern boundary, meaning that that was the northern boundary of Maryland. So when Penn received also his feoffment from the Duke of York he had a title to the northern part of Delaware with the present Maryland counties of Cecil, Harford, etc., while Lord Baltimore's charter included Lewes and the adjoining country as far up as a few miles above the mouth of Mispillion Creek. Yet it will be seen on a modern map that the 39th parallel, which runs about three miles north of Annapolis, would have cut off Maryland from any land at the headwaters of the Potomac. The third Lord Baltimore ran a line from the Susquehanna at the mouth of Octoraro Creek in rather a northeasterly direction towards the Delaware; but about the time of William Penn's death, Marylanders, with the 40th parallel in mind, began creeping up the west side of the river; and in 1729 Thomas Cresap established himself at Conejohela on land from which two years before the settlers under Pennsylvania had been withdrawn at the request of the Conestoga Indians. The exact location of the 40th parallel, like every other question of boundary, was so uncertain that he and his companions could claim alternate allegiance, as the authority of either Province was about to be exercised over them; so they burned Indian cabins, destroyed the Indians' goods and took away their guns, and killed the horses of the traders. On May 10, 1732, Charles, fifth Lord Baltimore, executed an agreement with John, Thomas, and Richard Penn, joining William Penn the heir-at-law, that the boundary line should be run by commissioners from each side as follows: starting from the middle point of a line due west from Cape Henlopen to Chesapeake bay, the line should run until as a tangent it touched the periphery of a circle drawn at twelve miles distance from New Castle, thence due north until it came to the latitude of fifteen miles due south of the southernmost point of the city of Philadelphia, i. e., of the point where the southerly line of South street strikes the river Delaware, and from the junction of that line and that latitude, as the northeast corner of Maryland, a line should be run due west to the extent of Pennsylvania, but for the present 25 miles west of the Susquehanna should suffice. Baltimore's commissioners interposed every pretence to prevent the running of the line according to its plain meaning, and yet to relieve him from paying the £5,000 stipulated in the agreement to be forfeited by the party failing to carry it out. Lord Baltimore alleged that after arriving in Maryland in November, 1732, after the joint commissioners had begun their fruitless parleys, he found out that he had been deceived by false maps into an agreement which was wholly one-sided, in which, finally surrendering New Castle, Kent, and Sussex, he had agreed to a limit on the north which took from him about 2,500,000 acres south of the 40th parallel.

JOHN PENN THE AMERICAN

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

JOHN PENN THE AMERICAN

The joint commissioners adjourned sine die Nov. 24, 1733, the Maryland commissioners adhering to their contention that the circle around New Castle must be twelve miles in circumference, instead of in radius. Baltimore went back to England, and on Aug. 8, 1734, while John Penn was on his way to America, petitioned the King for a confirmation of title to so much of the peninsula as was embraced in the bounds in Cecilius Calvert's patent, notwithstanding the clause "hactenus inculta" in the preamble thereto. The Lords of Trade, to whom the petition was referred on its presentation, reported in the following January that the Lower Counties were included within the limits of Calvert's patent, and that the clause "hactenus inculta" did not except them from the grant. On May 16 the King, after a hearing of both sides by the Privy Council, ordered that the whole matter, including a counter petition from the Penns, should be postponed until Michaelmas Term, to enable either party to proceed in a court of equity as to the agreement of 1732. The Penns filed a bill in chancery on June 21, for specific performance of the agreement, and the clearing of doubts about the circle and centre, offering to fix the centre in the middle of the town of New Castle. Baltimore's answer set up that the agreement was void from imposition upon him, and for want of consideration.

Samuel Blunston acted as the Proprietaries' agent on the west side of the Susquehanna, and, prior to the treaty of 1736, granted licenses to settlers in those parts, which in due time were deemed sufficient evidence of title. Some Germans went across, and were paying county levies to Lancaster county, when their neighbor, Thomas Cresap, holding under a Maryland title, induced them to acknowledge Lord Baltimore as landlord. The Germans finding the rents asked for, heavy, and being told that the land was not Baltimore's, sent a writing to the Governor of Maryland explicitly renouncing the allegiance. The sheriff of Baltimore county, with 300 men on horseback, armed with carbines, pistols, and cutlasses, headed by trumpet and drum, commanded by

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Colonel Edward Hall, came up to Conejohela to dispossess the Germans; but the sheriff of Lancaster, gathering 150 inhabitants, although he had no arms or ammunition for them, demanded by what right the peace of his county was broken: and, indeed, John Hendricks's plantation, where some came, was upwards of 20 miles

Map showing location of Fort Shirley

A frontier fort in Huntingdon County north of the line agreed upon in 1732, and it was not then known whether Cresap's was actually south of the 40th parallel. The Marylanders, after capturing one man for alleged riot, and after distraining at some of the houses, retired, sending word to the Germans, that, if they would return to their allegiance, the taxes should be remitted for the present, but if they did not do so within two weeks, a greater force would come, and put into possession those who would be more faithful. Cresap seems to have started the project of about 50 persons of what Pennsylvania called the lower parts of Chester county, to remove to these lands, expected to be vacant through the ousting of the former occupiers, the Deputy Governor of Maryland issuing warrants for 200 acres to each adventurer, and Cresap taking arms and ammunition up the Chesapeake from Annapolis, and enlisting some men at 12*l.* per annum. But the Pennsylvania officials arrested some of the leaders. The Lancaster county people then determined that Cresap, who held a captain's commission from Maryland, must not remain at large. A warrant against him on the charge of murder, claimed by his friends to have been in self-defence, had been issued by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania; so Samuel Smith, the sheriff of Lancaster, gathered a posse of 24, and on November 24 proceeded to the house of Cresap, where they found him ready for defence, with six men bound by oath to stand by him, and to shoot not only their assailants, but any one of themselves who surrendered. One of the six escaped from the others by going up through the chimney. When Cresap refused to yield, the sheriff secured more assistance, and besieged the place, the inmates keeping up a fusillade until near sundown, when the sheriff set fire to the house, in which were also Cresap's wife and children. Cresap would not surrender, although offer was made to extinguish the flames. When the floor was about to fall in, those inside made a rush, and in the confusion one of the defenders was killed. The Pennsylvanians claimed that it was by the bullet of one of his companions, all five of whom were secured, and, except one left at Lancaster on a charge of rape, were taken to Philadelphia and put in its jail, Cresap on the previous charge of murder, the others on that of riot. The Lieutenant-Governor of Maryland sent Edward Jennings and Daniel Dulany to Philadelphia to treat for the discharge of the prisoners, and the punishment of the sheriff and his men, but the only result was taking the irons off Cresap. The Council and Assembly of Pennsylvania united in a petition to the King, following one by the Germans interested. Charles Higginbotham, having obtained a captain's and justice's commission from the Lieutenant-Governor of Maryland, and led a small party up the Susquehanna, was guilty of a number of severities or outrages by which the Germans were reduced to a deplorable condition. However, on August 8, 1737, the King ordered both Governors to preserve peace on their respective borders, and to make no grants of any part of the lands in contest between the Proprietors or of any parts of the Lower Counties, and to permit no person to settle there until his Majesty's pleasure be further signified. On complaint by the Penns and the agent for the Province of Pennsylvania of further disorders by Marylanders, the Lords of Trade effected an agreement between the adverse Proprietaries that the former order stand except as to the Lower Counties; that all lands possessed by or under either should remain in such possession and under such jurisdiction until final settlement of the boundaries; that as to vacant land outside of the Lower Counties, and not in possession as aforesaid, on the east side of the Susquehanna as far south as $15\frac{1}{4}$ miles south of the latitude of the southernmost point of Philadelphia, and on the west side as far south as $14\frac{3}{4}$ miles south of the said latitude, the temporary jurisdiction should be in the Proprietors of Pennsylvania; and as to the vacant lands south of such limits, the temporary jurisdiction should be in the Proprietor of Maryland; and that within the limits of their jurisdictions respectively the Proprietors could grant lands on the usual terms, accounting to each other after the final determination. The King granted an order for carrying out this agreement, May 25, 1738; and the temporary line was run.

JOHN PENN THE AMERICAN

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Logan, after the arrival of the new Lieutenant-Governor, and continuance for a year more as Chief Justice, retired from public affairs except occasional presence at Indian treaties, devoting himself to very extensive literary and scientific pursuits. Before his death in 1751 he gave his great collection of books for the use of the public. This, known as the Loganian Library, of which his heir-at-law was to be librarian, and for which he gave a lot of ground, is now, with some additions, at the Ridgway Library building, administered by the Library Company of Philadelphia.

JOHN PENN THE AMERICAN

George Thomas arrived on June 1, 1738. The Proprietaries instructed him not to assent to any law for making or continuing bills of credit unless it enacted that the quit rents and other rents due or to become due to the Proprietaries, be paid according to the rate of exchange between Philadelphia and London. The Assembly having presented to him an act for reprinting, etc., all the bills of credit outstanding, and for striking the further sum of 11,110*l.* 5*s.* on loan, he pointed out, that, as the exchange between Philadelphia and London was 70 per cent., while the discount on Proclamation money, according to the act of Parliament of 6 Annæ was only £33,6*s.*, 8*d.* per £100, it was unjust to oblige persons to receive the paper money at the value of Proclamation money for debts contracted to be paid in English money, and he proposed to except all debts, rents, and quit rents to the Proprietaries, and all debts due in Great Britain agreed to be paid in sterling. The Assembly rejected this, but proposed if the bill without such amendment be passed, to pay 1,200*l.* to the Proprietaries as a compensation for their losses in the difference in exchange on the quit rents already due, and 130*l.* annually for their losses on those falling due in the time named in the bill. Thomas Penn accepted this, as a necessary sacrifice for the public good, feeling that a failure to re-emit the current bills of credit would be injurious to the trade of the province. Lieutenant-Governor Thomas explained the extent of this sacrifice; the arrearages were £11,000 sterling, so that to make up even 50 per cent., 1,833*l.*, 6*s.*, 6*d.* were required, and to make up 70 per cent., 4,033*l.*, 6*s.* 8*d.*

In October, 1739, the prospect of a war with the yet mighty kingdom of Spain induced the Lieutenant-Governor with some eloquence to ask the Assembly to prepare for the defence of the province. It had been about thirty years, and there had been great progress since a similar request had been made. The

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Quakers being in the majority, the Assembly sent back the old answer; nor could Thomas, by eloquence or argument, by courtesy or ill-suppressed indignation, move them to consent to a militia law, even when those conscientiously opposed to fighting were to be exempted from its provision. In the course of a series of messages between Thomas and the Assembly, Israel Pemberton Jr. said in conversation with several persons in Alexander Graydon's house, that it was known what the Governor was before he came over, and what there was to expect of him. It was his design to overturn the Constitution, and reduce this to a King's government, and it would be proved on him. Graydon, who was not a sympathizer with the Quakers, said that as probably the dispute would be laid before their superiors, the latter would best judge of his behavior. Pemberton replied that he did not doubt the Governor would use all his friends to set the Assembly in the wrong, and would make an unjust representation of the matter. This conversation became the talk of the town. Pemberton went to Graydon the next day, but told him that he wanted no apology for his words being made public, for he was very glad that the Governor had heard truths which the sycophants who kept company with the Governor would never tell him. Thomas, claiming the right as chief magistrate to issue a warrant to bring persons before him for examination on charges of a breach of the peace, issued one against Pemberton, returnable that afternoon. Neither Thomas Griffitts, the third justice of the Supreme Court, nor any other councillor, objected, but when they met in the afternoon, awaiting the sheriff and Pemberton, Griffitts, called out of the room for a few minutes, signed a writ of habeas corpus and admitted Pemberton to bail. Thomas told the sheriff that the habeas corpus was illegal, and the officer answerable for Pemberton not being in his custody. The Lieutenant-Governor issued a second warrant. For several days the sheriff made an unsuccessful and perhaps not very earnest attempt to take Pemberton. War with Spain was proclaimed at the Town House on April 14, 1740, with cries of "God Save the King," firing of cannon from Society Hill, drinking to the King's health, and opening of beer for the populace. Pressing the Assembly to obey the royal instruction by providing victuals, transports, and other necessities for the troops to be raised in Pennsyl-

JOHN PENN THE AMERICAN

Brietenback Block House in 1895

East of Myerstown, Lebanon County; used as a rendezvous by the settlers, under Conrad Weiser, 1755. From a sketch made especially for this work vania for the expedition against the West Indies, the clothes, tents, arms, ammunition, and pay being provided by the government of Great Britain, Thomas offered to the Assembly to appoint commissioners to assist in the application of any money it might vote, and to render a regular account. The non-Quaker population organized seven companies of soldiers, but in these a large number of indentured servants enlisted. Many Quaker masters were thus injured. The Assembly took up the matter, and addressed the Governor; but the runaways had taken the oath, and a large portion had received the King's subsistence for several weeks, and the Governor declined to dismiss them, except as free men took their places. That the provision for the troops could be made in time, private citizens advanced the money. Thomas Penn sent word to the Assembly on Aug. 6 that, as he was very unwilling that any private interest of his family should make the House less capable of assisting his Majesty, he was content to wait for the payments due the Proprietaries until after provision for the forces. Finally, on the 9th of August, the Assembly yielded to the importunities for money, and voted 3,000*l.* to Thomas Griffiths, Edward Bradley, John Stamper, Isaac Norris, and Thomas Leech, "for the use of King George II.," provided, however, that no warrant for said sum should issue from the Speaker until all the servants enlisted should be returned to their masters free of all charges. A remonstrance to the King was drawn up, and Richard Partridge was appointed agent for the province, so as to present this. At the next Assembly, a committee reported the number of servants thus eloigned as 262, and compensation was made to the masters.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The Society of Friends, although numbering, it is said, only one-third of the population, was admirably organized for politics as well as religion and charity: the Yearly Meeting gathered the chief men together just before the elections for assemblymen, and it was but natural that they should compare notes, and consult on the political situation and agree upon candidates. Yet all who professed themselves Quakers were not unanimously of the attitude represented by the Assembly. The Proprietaries and those affiliated with them and some others, had laid hold of a distinction between a lawful and an unlawful war, and naturally made themselves believe that their King was prosecuting a lawful war. Logan apparently had never been a non-resistant, and in 1741 wrote from his retirement at Stenton, a letter to the Meeting setting forth the defenceless state of the province and the ill consequences that might ensue upon men of their principles procuring themselves to be returned to the Assembly. The shrewder heads, anxious to ward off the influence of such an epistle—for they had cause to fear if once they withdrew from politics, their ascendancy could never be regained—hit upon the expedient of appointing a committee, Robert Jordan, John Brighthurst, Ebenezer Large, John Dillwyn, and Robert Strettell, to peruse the letter, and report whether it contained matters proper to be communicated to the Meeting. The committee reported, that, as it contained matters of a military and geographical nature, it was by no means proper to be read. Robert Strettell alone remarked, that, considering the letter came from a man of abundant experience, an old member who had a sincere affection for the welfare of the Society, he was apprehensive, should it be refused a reading, such a procedure would disgust not only him but the large body of Friends in England. This minority report was not expected, and John Brighthurst caught him by the coat, saying sharply, "Sit thee down, Robert Strettell, thee art single in that opinion." (Letter of Richard Peters.) The Assembly chosen in 1741 unanimously voted 3,000*l.* "for the King's use" forwarded through the agent in London; so the general course of Quaker majorities in time of war had been pursued; first an affirmance of conscientious scruples, and a denial of the province being in danger, and a firm although perhaps unspoken refusal to pass a militia law, then a plea of poverty, and, after many adjournments, until the opportunity to use the money most efficiently had passed, a loud cry against grievances, for which there was a committee ready, just as Friends had a meeting for sufferings, and finally an appropriation, not very generous, specified euphemistically as "for the King's use," and justified as rendering "tribute to Cæsar." Isaac Norris, son of William Penn's friend of that name, and grandson of Thomas Lloyd, was a leader of the strict Friends in the Assembly, differing in politics from Logan, one of whose daughters he had married. The various disputes between the Governor and the Quakers, or "Norris party," brought about contests for office as bitter as in modern times. The re-election of Norris to the Assembly in 1741 could not be prevented; and the Quakers had some vantage ground with Norris and his brother-in-law Griffiths and uncle Preston, as three of the aldermen of the city. But the corporation was too important a political factor to be allowed to feel his influence. The adverse party mustered a majority to elect four new aldermen and five new councilmen who would further the Governor's plans; and the prominence of the Lloyd connection and even the equal footing of the Quakers in that board was destroyed forever. It was not so easy to defeat Norris at a popular election. In 1742, after a session in which he had been head of nearly every committee, and in which he had performed lasting services in superintending the completion of portions of the State House, and in purchasing a site and devising plans for a Lazaretto, the wealthy Recorder of the city, William Allen, contended for his seat in the House. The German settlers had invariably voted with the Quakers, and it was charged that the "Norris party" had been in possession of the polls, crowded out their opponents, and elected their candidate with the aid of unnaturalized voters. But if the Governor's friends cried "fraud," they were now guilty of "bulldozing." On election day of that year a party of sailors, strong enough in numbers to make havoc in the little city, marched up from the wharves, applied their clubs, and, wounding several, drove the disciples of peace from the State House. In the hubbub that followed, Allen is reported to have said "They had as good a right to be there as the unnaturalized Dutchmen;" he took no steps to preserve the peace, and his supposed complicity lost him many votes. Such violence brought a reaction in public feeling, and Norris was returned. A fresh controversy arose from this "Riot of 1742," the new Assembly desiring the Governor to bring the officers of the city corporation to trial before the Supreme Court, and the Governor refusing, after which a resolution was passed censuring the E Braddock.

JOHN PENN THE AMERICAN

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Generalissimo of all British soldiers in the Colonies, 1755; defeated by the Indians and French near the Monongahela river, 1755 officers in question for neglect of duty. In time the Lieutenant-Governor and Assembly attempted an harmonious course. Certain bills which had been insisted upon, he finally assented to, and the money-voting power granted him his means of subsistence.

JOHN PENN THE AMERICAN

In July, 1742, about 200 Indians, among them deputies from all of the Six Nations except the Senecas, Canassatego the Onondaga being speaker, came to Philadelphia to receive the goods in exchange for the land west of the Susquehanna, purchased in 1736. He explained the absence of the Senecas by their starving condition; a father had killed two of his children to preserve the lives of himself and the rest of his family. When the 45 guns, 60 kettles, 160 coats, 100 blankets, etc., had been counted, Canassatego acknowledged compliance with the agreement, but said that he thought if the Proprietary himself had been present he would have given the Indians more, in consideration of their numbers and poverty. They knew the value of the lands, they knew, too, that land was everlasting, and the few goods were soon worn out and gone. Moreover, they complained that some whites had settled on the Juniata and at Mahanoy, beyond the land purchased and to the injury of the Delawares. The Lieutenant-Governor replied that the Proprietaries had taken the key of their chest with them, having in fact been more generous than the agreement called for. As to the increase in value, was it not owing to the industry of the whites? Had they not come, the land would have been of no use but to maintain the red men, and was there not enough left for that purpose? The Quaker government, however, never grudged the Indians a present, and so goods worth 300*l.* were given. Then the Six Nations were requested to turn the Delawares from New Jersey off the lands at the forks of the Delaware, and accordingly the Six Nations censured these "women," as they called them, and obliged them to move to Wyoming or Shamokin.

War with France was proclaimed in Pennsylvania on June 18, 1744, all the inhabitants capable of bearing arms being enjoined to provide themselves with firelock, bayonet, cartouch box, and powder and balls.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

After a fight near the James River between a party of the Six Nations and some Virginians, in which several on both sides were killed, the Lieutenant-Governor of Pennsylvania had offered mediation between that confederacy and the government of Virginia, and so was brought about a treaty at Lancaster between deputies of the confederacy and commissioners from Maryland and Virginia in June and July, 1744, Thomas being present, at which the Indians released their claims to land in those provinces, and peace and friendship were confirmed. The Indians were informed of the victories of the English over the French. Canassatego remarked that then they must have taken a good deal of rum from the French, and could better spare some to make the Indians rejoice with them; at which hint a dram for each was given in a small glass, which was called a "French glass." Canassatego the next day related how in recognition of their engagements they had told the Governor of Canada that none of his people should go through their country to hurt the English, and how they had secured the neutrality of the "Praying Indians," i. e., those converted to Roman Catholicism. Then Canassatego remarked that he had had a French glass; he now wanted a good-sized English glass; and the Governor told him that he was glad that he had such a dislike for what was French; "they cheat you in your glasses as well as in everything else." In the same year the Shawanees about Shamokin joined their brethren on the Ohio, and the Conoys moved from Conoytown to Shamokin. Peter Chartier, a trader partly of Shawanee blood, accepted a commission under the French, and at the head of a party of French and Shawanees, robbed and made prisoners of traders on the Ohio. On reports of a movement of French Indians against the colony, the Delawares at Shamokin were applied to to act as scouts, and harass any large body on the march, and join the frontiersmen in defence. There was some fear that the Six Nations, if they found the French in danger of extinction, would join with them to preserve the balance of power. One old chief said to Conrad Weiser, who at this time was the provincial interpreter and messenger, that they knew their true interests; they would be neutral until they must join with either side for their own preservation; if one side drove the other out of America, the Six Nations would no longer receive consideration. The Commissioners of Indian Affairs at Albany proposed a meeting there with representatives of the confederacy, and, Lieutenant-Governor Thomas's health forbidding the journey, Thomas Lawrence and John Kinsey attended from Pennsylvania. They declined to join the commissioners from New York, Massachusetts, and Connecticut in asking the Six Nations to make war on the eastern Indians for killing some whites. While to that proposition an answer was promised after a demand for satisfaction should be made upon the French Indians, Lawrence and Kinsey in a separate interview secured a reiteration of the undertaking to keep the French from passing through their country on the way to attack the English. Lawrence and Kinsey secured also a promise to meet the Catawbas at Philadelphia, to make peace with them.

Braddock's Field

Showing old township road. Engraved especially for this work from an old print in possession of Henry A. Breed

JOHN PENN THE AMERICAN

It may be doubted whether the members of the Pennsylvania Assembly, ruling their conduct by their conscience, and taking care of the interests of their constituents, did not do about all they could in a war started by the question scarcely important to them, who should be German Emperor. When their King commanded that the colonies should carry out the requisitions of Commodore Peter Warren, and the latter asked for men armed and victualled for at least seven months to garrison the recently captured Louisburg, the Assembly on 5 mo. 24, 1745, voted 4,000*l.* for the King's use, to be laid out by John Pole and John Mifflin "in the purchase of bread, beef, pork, flour, wheat, and other grain or any of them within this Province, and to be shipped from hence for the King's service as the Governor shall think most fit." When this resolve was communicated to Thomas in due form by two of the members, he told them that since the House had particularized for what the money should be spent, the mere putting of the shipping of it under his charge was no compliment to him. A little later he invented the interpretation, which Franklin would have us suppose was intended by the Quakers, that "other grain" meant gunpowder. So the forces were supplied with ammunition as well as victuals, the Lieutenant-Governor could claim that his province had satisfied the King, and the Quaker assemblymen said to their consciences that the matter had passed out of their hands. The next year, on receipt of the royal order for troops to join Governor Gooch's command at Albany for the campaign against Canada and for the provisions and part of the arms and clothing for them, the Assembly offered to vote money for the King's use by issuing bills of credit; but there had been previously received a royal instruction that no act for that purpose should be passed without a clause suspending it until approved of by the King, and the Lieutenant-Governor urged that the money be raised by a loan on the security of the excise or the income accruing from the mortgages given to the loan office. The Assembly replied that there was a deficiency in these sources of income, and any additional tax would be inconvenient. The Lieutenant-Governor thought that a population which for over twenty years had not paid a tax on estates could afford to pay off in a short period what should now be borrowed in excess of what the Assembly voted; but on June 24, 1746, he consented to an act granting 5,000*l.* to the King's use out of the bills of credit remaining to be exchanged for torn and ragged bills, and for striking the like sum to replace them. The 24th of July was a thanksgiving day for the Duke of Cumberland's victory over the Pretender's Scotch forces at Culloden. The Lieutenant-Governor's proclamation ordered the magistrates to prevent all immoralities and riotous disorders, "that the day may be observed with a solemnity becoming our Christian profession, and not as has been too often the practice, with drunkenness and other kinds of licentiousness."

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

ROBERT MORRIS

Etched for this work by Albert Rosenthal from the painting by Gilbert Stuart.
In possession of the family.

JOHN PENN THE AMERICAN

Four companies from Pennsylvania went to Albany, the Lieutenant-Governor procuring them clothing, arms, and ammunition on his own credit, in expectation of remittances from Lieutenant-General St. Clair, who was to go from England to Louisburg as commander-in-chief. But St. Clair and the money not arriving, Thomas applied to the Assembly for a loan to His Majesty to pay for those articles and discharge the arrears due to the soldiers and provide subsistence for the time being. The House answered that there was no money to lend to the Crown, but he could use his own judgment about applying what was left of the 5,000*l.* to the present exigencies. Four months subsistence from the time of the arrival of the companies at Albany was secured from Gen. Gooch, and Thomas applied to the Assembly to continue this. The Assembly then thought that as the time for the campaign had elapsed, the troops could come home.

On October 25, 1746, John Penn, "the American," died unmarried at Hitcham, Co. Bucks, England. Thomas, in condoling with the Assembly upon the event, spoke of his humanity, good nature, and affability.

CHAPTER XIII.

THOMAS PENN AND RICHARD PENN

THE Penn estates in Pennsylvania and what is now Delaware were of four kinds. First, the millions of unoccupied and unappropriated acres, vast in future value, although their mineral wealth was not then dreamed of; as to these millions of acres, there were two sets of claims to be satisfied, those of the Indians and those of white purchasers whose rights had not been surveyed; the Indians, as we have seen, had by this time relinquished all the land southeast of the Blue mountains, and the "first purchasers" from William Penn had nearly all secured the warrant, the survey, and the patent whereby their indefinite property of so many acres "in Pennsylvania" had been located, and the subsequent purchasers took up their lands rapidly, some making bargains for definite tracts, the whole matter of granting warrants and making surveys as well as fixing price being in the hands of the Proprietaries and the officers who were their private servants. Then, secondly, were the quit rents, originally a shilling annually for every one hundred acres taken up by purchasers, higher on later grants; but as to the lots in Philadelphia these rents were larger, and as to the "bank lots," i. e., those on the east side of Front street running down the bank to the water, these rents were to be increased at the end of every fifty years to a rent equal to one-third of the value then to be ascertained of both lot and improvements thereon. The quit rents were not easily, and never promptly, collected: they were vexatious in the country, and in the city, being more considerable, were often extinguished like any ground rent. Thirdly, under the original plan that William Penn should take a tenth of the land as his private property, he and his sons and in fact his grandsons had large tracts surveyed for themselves as manors. Within these they let at will, from year to year, or for years, or sold at rent or prices according to special agreement, or their servants followed agriculture. Lastly, there was

THOMAS AND RICHARD PENN

Rocking Family Meat-Cutter

Used by the early German settlers. Photographed especially for this work from the original in possession of J. F. Sachse the private property which had come to the Penns in other ways than by virtue of being Proprietaries, for instance that devised by Thomas Callowhill. The "Historical Review of the Constitution and Government of Pennsylvania," printed in 1759, gives in the appendix an estimate of the Penn estates exclusive of the unoccupied and unappropriated lands which we first mentioned, prepared by Thomas Penn in John Penn's lifetime. After stating the value of quit rents reserved and the unpaid purchase money due as 188,278*l.* 10*s.*, Pennsylvania money, including 1,000*l.* as the value of the ferry franchises leased at 40*l.* per annum, he enumerates the private lands, etc., as follows, the estimated value being also in Pennsylvania money:

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

MANORS

1	Conestogoe, 65 m. from the city, 13,400 acres at 40 l. per H.	5,360
2	Gilbert's 25 3,200 70	2,240
3	Springfield 12 1,600 75	1,200
4	Highlands 35 2,500 30	750
5	Springtown 37 10,000 35	3,500
6	Vincent's 40 20,000 35	7,000
7	Richland's 35 10,000 15	1,500
9	About 20 tracts in the several counties, mostly 500 acres each, reckoned 10,000 at 40 l.	4,000
	Springetsbury 207 acres at 5 l.	1,035
8	On the north side of the town 50 30	1,500
	Back of the said land 15 10	150
9	Lot in the bank at north end of the town, 200 feet at 3 l.	600
10	A front and back lot between Vine and Sassafras street, 102 feet, at 6 l.	612
11	Bank lot between Cedar and Pine 204 feet at 3 l.	612
12	Front lot on the side of Cedar street 102 3	306
13	Ditto between Cedar and Pine 160 2	320
14	Bank lot between the same streets 40 2	80
15	Marsh land near the town, 600 acres at 3 l.	1,800
16	Ditto 200 acres at 1 s. sterling rent, and 165 per cent. is	330
	Lands within the draft of the town, at least 500 acres, 250 nearest Delaware at 15 l. per acre	3,750
	250 nearest Schuylkill at 10 l. per acre	2,500
17	Omitted—Streeper's tract in Bucks Co. 35 miles, 5,000 acres at 25 l.	1,250
18	The rents of the above manor and lands being 77,072 acres at a halfpenny per acre. 20 years purchase at 165 per cent. exchange	5,298.12 s.
		45,693 l. 12 s.
	Value of quit rents reserved and unpaid purchase money due including value of ferry franchise as 1,000 l.	188,278 l. 10 s.
		233,972 l. 2 s.
	The Government to be calculated at no less than was to have been paid for it, viz.: £11,000 at 165 per cent. is	18,150
		252,122 l. 2 s.

THOMAS AND RICHARD PENN

In this calculation no notice is taken of the thirds reserved on the bank lots (a copy of the patents J. Penn has by him to shew the nature of them) and nine-tenths of the Province remains undisposed of.

Three-fifths of all royal mines is reserved in the grants, and in all grants since the year 1732 one-fifth part of all other mines delivered at the pit's mouth without charge is also reserved.

No value is put on the Proprietor's right to escheated lands; and besides these advantages, several offices are in the Proprietor's gift of considerable value.

Register-General about	200 l .
Naval officer	300 l .
Clerk of Philadelphia	400 l .
Chester	300 l .
Bucks	200 l .
Lancaster	200 l .

Besides several other offices of less value. These are only guessed at."

The will of John Penn, in accordance with his covenant to leave his estate to one or both of his brothers, gave his moiety of Pennsylvania and the Lower Counties to Thomas Penn for life, with remainder to his sons in the order of birth successively in tail male. Therefore during the twenty-nine years that Thomas survived, he had three times as much share as the youngest brother, Richard, or the son who succeeded the latter.

Of Richard Penn, who never came to Pennsylvania, the chief thing to remark is that at an early date he forsook the Society of Friends, and if he did not sacramentally join, otherwise conformed to the Church of England, his children receiving infant baptism. His children who lived to grow up, were John, Hannah, and Richard, of whom Hannah married James Clayton, and died without issue; John figures in our history as Councillor, Lieutenant-Governor, and Proprietary; and Richard was also Lieutenant-Governor, and alone left children, but these died without issue, the last in 1863. Of Lieutenant-Governor Richard Penn's brilliant son William, who made a derogatory and unlucky marriage, when on a visit to Pennsylvania, George IV. said: "He was a Pen often cut (drunk) but never mended." Richard Penn the Proprietary died Feb. 4, 1771.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Thomas Penn, at John's death, took the direction in the government and business of property to which his share and seniority entitled him, and for which ability and experience fitted him. He was master over his weak nephew John, whom he sent away and kept away from the girl, objectionable in herself or her surroundings, perhaps only because they were humble, whom as a schoolboy John had married. He himself remained a bachelor until 1751, when he entered a family of the nobility by marrying Lady Juliana, daughter of Thomas Fermor, first Earl of Pomfret, second Baron Lempster, etc. From a mercer's apprentice, as Jenkins has supposed, at the death of the Founder of Pennsylvania, the middle-aged bridegroom had risen to be one of the rich gentry of England, ruler of an American principality larger than Ireland. He ceased to be a Quaker, regularly attending church after his marriage, and in 1760 purchased the historic seat of Stoke Park at Stoke Pogis, where he established his family. His sister Margaret's child, Philadelphia Hannah Freame, married in 1770 Thomas Dawson, Baron Dartrey, afterwards Viscount Cremorne, whose first wife was Lady Juliana's sister. Thomas Penn died March 21, 1775. Although he left sons, and one of them had children, the only descendants now living in male or female line of the Founder's second wife are through Thomas's daughter, who married, in 1796, Rev. Dr. William Stuart, afterwards Archbishop of Armagh.

John Penn, the American, had not thought well of a suggestion to make Thomas Penn the Lieutenant-Governor, perhaps because of the latter's want of popularizing manners, perhaps because he had already entered upon a life offensive in morals. An anecdote of his want of cordiality or effusiveness is worth repeating. When the Rev. Hugh David of Gwynedd called on him, having prepared a poem of welcome referring to the descent which

THOMAS AND RICHARD PENN

William Penn had claimed from the Welsh Tudors, Thomas Penn spoke three sentences: "How dost do?" "Farewell." "The other door." Mr. David did not hand him the poem. Watson, in the "Annals of Philadelphia," tells us how the hunter who made the Walk of 1737 received such small pay that he "damned Penn and his half wife to their faces." Watson further relates that when Thomas Penn was leaving Pennsylvania, some fellows raised a gallows across the road over which he had to pass. We may say that all through as a general rule in the conduct of affairs connected with Pennsylvania he showed the acquisitiveness of the land speculator with the selfishness of the aristocrat. Yet he had some public spirit, giving money or lots to certain institutions as well as to private individuals, and perhaps to reprobate his making the most of his property would be to demand of him the self-abnegation of a philanthropist or the proverbial, yet seldom found, generosity of a prince.

We will now proceed to a narration of the events of the earlier years of Thomas and Richard Penn's governorship and proprietaryship.

George Thomas, in his message announcing the death of John Penn, also notified the House of his own intended relinquishment of the lieutenant-governorship and departure for England, on account of his health. After the conflict between him and the Assembly, there was now harmony, and the House declared that his continuance in the exercise of the government would have been most agreeable to the members, and that nobody doubted his skill or abilities, and they believed that he had been regardful of both the King's service and the honor and reputation of the province.

At the last meeting of the Council presided over by Thomas, May 29, 1747, James Logan's resignation was accepted, he not having considered himself a member since Thomas's accession; and it was unanimously agreed that the following only were members, and in the following order of precedence, viz.: Anthony Palmer, Thomas Lawrence, Samuel Hasell, William Till, Abraham Taylor, Robert Strettell, James Hamilton, Benjamin Shoemaker, Joseph Turner, Lawrence Growdon, and Thomas Hopkinson. William Logan, son of James, was then appointed, to take a seat at the next meeting. This was held on June 6, Thomas having meanwhile embarked, and Anthony Palmer as eldest councillor became President. He had come from Barbados forty years before, having been a merchant there, and, it would appear, a sea captain. He was a Churchman, and lived in considerable style. On his plantation in the Northern Liberties, from which, it is said, he came to the city in a barge, he started a town, to which he gave the name of Kensington.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

At this time the dominion of the Penns was the granary of America; Philadelphia the supply port for provisions for any fleet operating above the Spanish Main. So whenever there was a war, an embargo was laid, from which the traders suffered. But now the trade with the other British possessions was nearly at a standstill from privateers in the bay. Landing parties burned plantations in the Lower Counties, and the city was in terror lest some French or Spanish man-of-war would make its way up the unprotected river, and have the place at its mercy. The Assembly was appealed to in vain to do something for defence. No militia law could be passed, had the Assembly been ever so willing, for, with no Governor, there was no power of legislation. Money, it had not, and while controlled by Quakers, it would not undertake obligations for such purposes. Benjamin Franklin, who for some years had been Clerk of the Assembly, and also Deputy Postmaster-General under ex-Governor Spotswood, of Virginia, wrote a pamphlet called Plain Truth, and suggested an association for defense at a town meeting. About 1,200 persons present enrolled themselves. Altogether about 10,000 names came in from the whole province. A battery was established where, sixty years afterward, the United States started its navy yard (foot of Prime street, Philadelphia). Franklin and other prominent citizens went over to New York with a request from the Council, and induced Governor Clinton to let them have eighteen cannon. Franklin started a lottery for the battery; and James Logan spent 60*l.* in tickets, ordering any prizes that he might draw to be devoted to the cause. A motion was carried in the fire company, in which were many Quakers, to appropriate money for a fire engine, and the mover of the motion and the rest of the committee bought a fine cannon, that being what the war-like members meant by a "fire engine." The 7th of January, 1747-8, was a day of fasting and prayer. Application was made to the Admiralty for a British man-of-war to cruise in the bay. The Otter sloop, Capt. Ballet, was sent, through the endeavors of the Proprietaries in London, but met with a very large vessel on the way, fought for four hours, and was so much weakened as to have to be repaired before attempting any service. Although the plan of the military association, whereby, among other features, the men elected their officers, and these were not under the command of the acting Governor, was irregular, the attendance was so constant and the drilling so careful that it was the opinion of most strangers that Pennsylvania had the best militia in America and one of the best furnished batteries of its size on the continent.

Map of Pennsylvania issued in 1756

Photographed especially for this work from a copy in possession of Dr. W. J. Holland

THOMAS AND RICHARD PENN

By a treaty held at Lancaster in July, 1748, the Twightees dwelling on the Wabash were brought into alliance with Pennsylvania, and the Shawanees no longer with Chartier were received back into favor.

A preliminary treaty of peace was signed at Aix-la-Chapelle on April 19, 1748, acceded to by Spain on June 17, and a definitive treaty at the same place on October 7, subsequently acceded to by Spain, Austria, etc.

James Hamilton, of Bush Hill, in the Northern Liberties, who had been mayor of Philadelphia, and was a member of the Governor's Council, a son of the former Attorney-General, received, while sojourning in London, the Proprietaries' commission as Lieutenant-Governor, and arrived at home in November, 1748. He was the only inhabitant of the province appointed to that office after the death of Penn, in whose lifetime, moreover, Lloyd and Markham at his second appointment were the only ones. So the new Lieutenant-Governor was hailed with pleasure; but he had a dispute with his first Assembly. It passed a bill for the issuing of 20,000*l.* in bills of credit. The instructions sent in 1740 by the British Ministry having forbidden the Governor to pass any act for that purpose without a clause suspending its operation until the royal assent should be given, Hamilton proposed an amendment to that effect; whereupon the Assembly unanimously resolved that it would be "destructive of the liberties derived to them by the royal and provincial charters," the charter of Charles II having expressly authorized the legislature of the province to enact laws which should remain in force five years or until the King repealed them. Hamilton remained firm, considering that these instructions were contemplated in the bond of £2,000 which he had given on his taking office; and Ryder, ex-Attorney-General of England, afterwards gave an opinion sustaining him.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

On August 22, 1749, Hamilton purchased for the Proprietaries from the Six Nations a tract bounded by the Delaware and Susquehanna rivers, extending from the Blue mountains to a line running from the mouth of Lackawaxen creek to the mouth of Mahanoy Creek. York county, including what is now Adams, was formed in 1749, and Cumberland, lying west and southwest of it, in 1750, Berks and Northampton in 1752.

On May 15, 1750, Lord Chancellor Hardwicke decided the case brought by the Penns against Lord Baltimore in 1737, saying that from the mighty interests involved "it was worthy the judicature of a Roman Senate rather than of a single judge." He found that, in making the agreement of 1732 for settling the boundaries, Lord Baltimore was neither surprised nor imposed upon nor ignorant. There was no mistake as to the intention of the parties. The settlement of boundaries was a sufficient consideration to both. It was not necessary for the court to go into the question of the original right of the parties, it being sufficient that the right was doubtful. The clearest point, the Chancellor said, was as to the circle around New Castle; it was to be twelve miles in radius, with the center of the town for its center. So he decreed specific performance without prejudice to any right of the Crown.

THOMAS AND RICHARD PENN

This decision, disposing of one boundary question, left others looming up about this time. That with Connecticut was scarcely thought of. Charles II granted on April 23, 1662, nineteen years before the charter to Penn, a charter to Connecticut, bounding it as follows: "On the east by Narragansett river, commonly called Narragansett bay, where the said river falleth into the sea; on the north by the line of the Massachusetts Plantation, and on the south by the sea, and in longitude as the line of the Massachusetts colony running from east to west, that is to say from the said Narragansett bay on the east to the South Sea on the west part." As was well pointed out by Provost William Smith, D. D., if this description was to be literally followed, the south line of Connecticut would run down the whole Atlantic coast line of America to Cape Horn and up the Pacific coast line, where it would coincide with the western boundary, the Pacific Ocean, or South Sea. As between Connecticut and New York a boundary line was fixed, which in Penn's time was supposed to be as far west as the former would ever claim. Over thirty years after his death some of the inhabitants of that crowded colony took up the notion that although New York was to be excepted from the operation of their old charter, any land west of New York was not, and that the jurisdiction lawfully, jumping New York, ran across Pennsylvania and any other region where Europeans were not in possession at the date of the charter. The southern line of their claim was the latitude of the southernmost point of Connecticut east of New York. Unreasonable as we think this claim, yet if it could have been satisfied without embroiling the British colonies with the Indians, it would have been for the best interests of America. Connecticut was the most thickly populated of the colonies, needed a chance to overflow, and could have sent an energetic, self-reliant, and belligerent community to subdue the earth, and stand against the French.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

The events recorded in our next chapter made the boundary between Pennsylvania and Virginia a matter for consideration. Charles II's charter to William Penn gave him five degrees of longitude westward from the eastern bounds, that is from the Delaware river; but did that mean five degrees from the longitude of the point where the river crossed the northern boundary line, which would seem reasonable, or five degrees from the westernmost point of the meandering river within the borders, or five degrees from the easternmost point thereof within the borders? Or did it mean that the western boundary was not to be a straight line, but a series of curves paralleling the course of the Delaware and each point five degrees from the corresponding point of the river? A good portion of the present state of West Virginia lies north of the 39th parallel, which was in so many words made our southern boundary. The fixing of a boundary with Maryland north of this parallel was based upon a private agreement to which Virginia was not a party, and did not prevent Pennsylvania from having an L running along the western boundary of Maryland.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE FRENCH INVASION

WE now come to a time when, upon a wider question of boundaries, there were not merely a few casualties, but, the parties being two "world-powers," blood was poured over the mountains of Pennsylvania, the food as well as the shelter for man and beast was reduced to ashes in the rich frontier valleys, families were decimated by the snatching away of loved ones to captivity among savages, while extortion, rapine, and lust had their victims, as usual, in the path of the enemy's raid or the friendly army's march. Prior to the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, as far as we know, there had never been any fort, post or settlement of Frenchmen within the present limits of this State, although Brulé had, in 1615, visited Tioga Point (Athens, Bradford county), Canadians had made maps of the country west of the Alleghanies, and French missionaries and traders were in possession of the lower Ohio. When, therefore, after that treaty, notwithstanding the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, had described the Five Nations as subject to the dominion of Great Britain, and prohibited the subjects of France from hindering or molesting them or the other natives friendly to the same, and had given liberty to both sides to go and come on account of trade; when, notwithstanding this, French officers, basing their claim on early exploration and the restoration of original possessions by the treaties of peace, came to the banks of the Allegheny, which then was included under the name of Ohio river, or La Belle Rivière, and attempted to turn off the

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

English traders, we call it an invasion. Yet we cannot lay upon the governor of Canada, or the ministers of Louis XV, who may have prompted him or supported him, all the blame for the war, the first assaults of which the New England officials were champing to make, the first gun of which rascally traders from the middle provinces were scarcely restrained from firing. After all, Pennsylvania became a desolation because Great Britain, as she has done in engaging in several great wars, made herself a party to the scheme of non-resident speculators. The Ohio Company was chartered in 1749, composed mostly of Marylanders and Virginians, and obtained from the King of England a grant of 500,000 acres of land on the Ohio between the Monongahela and Kanawha rivers, on condition of building and garrisoning a fort, and within seven years settling one hundred families. By the interpretation finally adopted of Charles II's charter to William Penn, part of this land was in Pennsylvania and belonged to the Proprietaries thereof, saving the rights of the Indians, whom, however, none but Penn's heirs could legally buy off: by the contention of the French the whole of North America west of the Alleghanies was theirs. Previous to the chartering of this company, or before the fact was known to the Governor of New France, the latter, who was the Marquis de la Galissonnière, sent Celeron de Bienville to the Allegheny and further down the Ohio. He, finding Pennsylvania traders there, complained of it to Governor Hamilton, in August, 1749, and nailed up or buried plates "as a monument," the inscriptions said, "of our having retaken possession of the said River Ohio and of those that fall into the same and of all the lands on both sides as far as the sources of the said rivers, as well as of those of which the preceding kings of France have enjoyed possession, partly by force of arms, partly by treaties, especially by those of Ryswick, Utrecht, and Aix-la-Chapelle." Various embassies followed to induce the Indians recently in alliance with the English to return to their allegiance to the French, and let them build forts and monopolize trade. Christopher Gist, sent by the Ohio Company, and George Croghan and Andrew Montour, sent by the Governor of Pennsylvania, were the chief agents in foiling these attempts, or rather in confirming the Ohio Indians in their refusal. The French, not

THE FRENCH INVASION

Timothy Horsfield

Built the first private house at Bethlehem; took an important part in protecting the settlements against the Indians, 1755-1761; with William Parsons, he laid out the first road between Bethlehem and Easton. Photographed especially for this work from the original portrait in oil by Haidt in the possession of Dr. W. J. Holland confining themselves to presents and proclamations, arrested traders and confiscated their goods, while the conversion of many of the Indians in New York to the Roman Catholic religion seemed an entering lever which might turn the Six Nations. The Proprietaries, having been asked by the Assembly of Pennsylvania for a contribution to the necessary presents sent to the tribes by the Province, refused, but offered to give 400*l.* towards building a fort and 100*l.* a year towards maintaining in it, with arms and powder, a garrison of four or six men commanded by the chief trader. In this the Assembly refused to take part, saying that they did not believe the Ohio Indians really wished it, although Croghan's journal so stated. The Assembly added: "We have always found that sincere, upright dealing with the Indians, a friendly treatment of them on all occasions, and particularly in relieving their necessities at proper times by suitable presents, have been the best means of securing their friendship." The consequences of these refusals by the Proprietaries and the Assembly to strengthen each other's measures were more prolonged than in regard to securing the friendship of the wavering Indians, or control over their territory until the outbreak of actual war. We can see the beginning of the long struggle as to taxing the Penn estates, and the leaving open of the field to the claims of Virginia. The French proceeded to drastic measures against the Indians, whom they chose to call rebels. Thirty of the Twightees having been killed, the Shawanees wished to avenge them, but, before doing so, notified the Lieutenant-Governor of Pennsylvania, hoping for approval and aid. Hamilton, knowing that the principles of the Quakers were entirely adverse to assisting in an Indian war, and unwilling to promise what their control over the public funds would render him unable to perform, referred these chiefs to the commissioners from Virginia attending the council appointed by the King of England to be held at Logstown (below Pittsburg) in May, 1752. The Delawares, Shawanees, and Mingoes attended, and entered into a treaty with the Virginia commissioners not to molest English traders south of the Ohio. Tanacharisson, the local head under the Six Nations, and called the Half King, advised the building of a fort at the forks of the Monongahela. Gist, accordingly, laid out a town, and started a fort at Chartier's creek, and began a settlement just beyond Laurel Hill near the Youghiogheny with eleven families. The Ohio Company established also a trading post at Will's creek. The two places first mentioned were within the bounds of Pennsylvania.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

THE FRENCH INVASION

John, son of Richard Penn the Proprietary, arrived in December, 1752, to make his home in Pennsylvania. On February 6, 1753, the Lieutenant-Governor proposed his introduction as a member of the Provincial council, and asked the gentlemen present what place they would offer him; whereupon it was unanimously agreed that he should rank as first named, or eldest, councillor, and be President on the death or absence of the Governor. His name first appears upon the minutes in August following.

The Proprietaries directed Hamilton to assist Virginia in erecting any fort on the lands granted to the Ohio Company, taking, however, from the Governor of Virginia an acknowledgment that the settlement should not prejudice the Proprietaries' right to the country, and a promise that those who actually settled should hold the land on the usual quit rent. On tales of the approach of a French army toward the Ohio, Governor Dinwiddie of Virginia suggested that all the colonies raise a proper force to oppose it, and notify the British ministry, after first demanding the reason for such invasion in time of peace from the Governor-General of Canada. The Earl of Holderness, Secretary of State, on August 28, 1753, communicated royal instructions that if any foreign prince or state made encroachments, erected forts, or committed any other act of hostility, and persisted after a representation of such injustice, force was to be repelled by force, but only "within the undoubted limits of His Majesty's dominions." All the governors on the continent were to communicate with and support each other.

The French built a fort at Casoago, on French creek, near Venango, and returned a contemptuous answer to the Half-King, who went in person from his home at Logstown to warn them off the land. He was giving the third message, as usual, before taking up the hatchet. The Rev. Richard Peters, Isaac Norris and

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Benjamin Franklin, appointed by the Governor of Pennsylvania, met in September at Carlisle a number of the important chiefs of the Six Nations, Delawares, Shawanees, Twightees, and Owen-dats, on their way from a council with the Governor of Virginia at Winchester. Friendship was confirmed and presents distributed. Scarrooyady, the Oneida, said he supposed that Governor Dinwiddie's desire to build a fort on the Ohio was the cause of the advance of the French troops, and hoped that both Pennsylvania and Virginia would forbear at present from settling beyond the Alleghanies, advising that Pennsylvania call back her people, and duly appoint somebody to meet George Croghan, who was to be the agent on behalf of the Indians, and to whose house at Aughwick, on the Juniata, anything for them could be sent. Scarrooyady also said that the French had been afraid of losing their trade from the unnecessary number of English traders on the Ohio; and he asked that the traders be only in three places—Logstown, and the mouth of the Kanawha, and the mouth of Monongahela; he also represented that the English goods were too dear, and little else was brought to them but liquor and flour, which, he begged, would be regulated, as the whisky traders brought thirty or forty kegs, made the Indians drunk, and got all the skins with which the debts to the honest traders were to be paid. Dinwiddie sent George Washington, then twenty-one years old, with the rank of major in the military organization of Virginia, to have an interview with the commandant of the other fort which the French had built, viz.: on that branch of the Allegheny which they called La Rivière aux Bœufs (in the present Warren county). The commandant, Le Gardeur de St. Pierre, sent Dinwiddie's letter to La Galissonnière's successor, the Marquis Duquesne but told Washington that the country belonged to them; no Englishman had a right to trade upon the Ohio or its branches—and he had orders to arrest any that attempted to do so. William Trent, captain in the Virginia service, directed a fort to be made at the forks of the Monongahela; Governor Dinwiddie

Plan of Fort Augusta

Near Sunbury; erected in 1756. Photographed especially for this work from a copy in possession of the Wyoming Historical and Geological Society summoned his militia to meet at Will's creek, and the Lords of Trade requested the Provinces of Virginia, Pennsylvania, Maryland, New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, and New Jersey to send commissioners with presents to the treaty which the Province of New York was to hold with the Indians. The Governor of New York fixed the middle of June as the time and Albany as the place for the treaty. The Assembly of Pennsylvania passed a bill to issue 40,000*l.* in bills of credit on loans; Hamilton offered, if the members were still of opinion that bills of credit were necessary to raise supplies in this time of imminent danger, to agree to such, if a means of sinking them in a few years were provided. Just at this time persons from Connecticut, representing a Susquehanna company formed there, attempted to sell lands north of the 41st degree of latitude, as being embraced in the old patent to that colony, and announced that settlements would shortly be made at Wyoming, on the east branch of the Susquehanna. Governor Dinwiddie, also, upon obtaining 10,000*l.* from his House of Burgesses for troops, issued a proclamation offering, in addition to the pay of those who served to the satisfaction of their officers, shares in 200,000 acres of land, 100,000 contiguous to the fort at the forks of Monongahela, and 100,000 near by, on the east bank of the Ohio, to be free from quit rents for fifteen years. Hamilton was duly protesting against both attempts to take from the Penns slices of their province; while his Assembly was using the uncertainty of the bounds as an excuse for not supporting military measures. Governor Wolcott of Connecticut expressed himself as satisfied that his province wanted no quarrel with Pennsylvania, and highly approved of Hamilton's offer to procure for emigrants from Connecticut grants from the Proprietaries of some of their western land; and Governor Dinwiddie, hoping that soon there would be commissioners appointed by the King to run the line, as he had requested, said that meanwhile the quit rents due after the exemption from them should have expired, could be paid to the Penns.

THE FRENCH INVASION

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

A small fort having been erected at the forks of the Mohongiola, or Monongahela, by Ensign Ward, of Trent's company, Contrecoeur, commander of the French troops on the Ohio, appeared with 1,000 men and 18 cannon, and compelled its surrender on April 16, allowing Ward and his men to retire. They fell back to Red Stone creek. Starting from Will's creek with 150 men, and widening the road as they went so as to be passable for cannon, Washington arrived at Great Meadows (in Fayette county), and constructed an entrenchment, which he called Fort Necessity. Dinwiddie had supplied some friendly Indians with arms, and sent a belt with a hatchet by Trent to Scarrooyady. According to the latter's story of the affair which followed on May 28, he and some braves fell in with LaForce and thirty Frenchmen, and refused to hold a council with them, but informed Washington. Differing with him as to strategy, the Indians went away, but soon found the French in a hollow and hid themselves behind a hill, when they noticed Washington's force on the other side of the hollow in the gray light of the morning. He had started out in the night of the 27th. Washington's force began firing, when the Indians came from their cover, and closed with the French, killing ten and handing twenty-one prisoners to Washington. Among those killed was Jumonville, the leader, who, the French said, was bearer of a message, and whose death they called an assassination. LaForce was taken prisoner.

Governor Shirley of Massachusetts, who had offered to assist Pennsylvania in driving the French from her territory, on condition that Pennsylvania should some day reciprocate, suggested that the congress at Albany should be seized as the opportunity for effecting a union of the participating colonies, the commissioners to be empowered to fix the quota of men and money to be furnished by each for the measures they might agree upon. But Governor Hamilton could not obtain from his Assembly authority or appropriation except for renewing the covenant chain with the Indians and holding them in the British interest. John Penn and Richard Peters, councillors, and Isaac Norris and Benjamin Franklin, assemblymen, represented Pennsylvania at the congress, which began its session June 19, 1754. On the way, Franklin drew up a plan for the union of the colonies, which, with a few amendments, was unanimously adopted, and recommended to the various assemblies and the Lords Commissioners of Trade and Plantations. It provided for a central government, to be administered by a president-general, appointed by the Crown, and a grand council of forty-eight representatives chosen by the Colonial Assemblies, Virginia and Massachusetts each to have the largest number, seven, and Pennsylvania six. The President-General, with the advice of the council, was to make peace or declare war with the Indians, raise soldiers, build forts, and levy taxes. This plan was never brought before the King or Parliament. Hamilton told the Assembly of Pennsylvania that it was "well worthy of their closest and most serious attention," but, one day, when Franklin was absent, it was taken up and promptly rejected. The congress at Albany, however, established peace with the Six Nations, and then made a lengthy representation on the state of the colonies, setting forth the dominion of Great Britain over the country south of Lakes Champlain, Ontario, and Erie, as belonging to the Six Nations, with right in Frenchmen to visit it for trading, also the French aggressions in Nova Scotia, Maine, New Hampshire, and on the rivers running into the Mississippi, and their holding English traders for ransom, and alienating many of the Onondagas and Senecas from the English, and the danger of the whole continent being subjected to France. The representation also pointed out that the colonies were disunited, and there had never been any joint exertion of their force or counsels; that the patenting of large tracts of land to individuals or companies, except on condition of speedy settlement, prevented the strengthening of the frontiers, and that there had been great neglect of the affairs of the Six Nations; the laws of the various colonies, being insufficient to restrain the supply of liquor, the Indians were frequently drunk and cheated by traders, or else murdering one another, and fleeing to the French; the Indians were not capable of bargaining as to their lands, and, on sales to private persons, were cheated or felt themselves cheated. The representation suggested that an agent, not engaged in trade, should reside with each Indian nation, purchases of land from Indians, except by the government, should be void, the patentees of large tracts should be required to settle them speedily, on pain of forfeiture, the bounds of the colonies extending by the terms of the old charters to the Pacific Ocean should be limited by the Alleghanies, and measures should be taken for settling colonies of Protestants west of those mountains, and there should be a union of the colonies, so that their treasure and strength might be employed in due proportion against the common enemy. The chiefs of the Six Nations then sold to the Proprietaries of Pennsylvania for 1,000 pieces of eight, the land extending on the west side of the Susquehanna from the Blue mountains to a mile above the mouth of Kayarondinhagh (Penn's) creek, thence northwest by west to the western boundary of the Province, thence along the western boundary to the southern boundary, thence along the southern boundary to the Blue mountains, and thence along those mountains to the place of beginning. The deed is dated July 6, 1754. They refused to sell the land on the east branch of the Susquehanna; they had heard there was a dispute between Pennsylvania and New England about it, and they would sell it to neither; but Wyoming and Shamokin and the land contiguous on the river they would reserve for a hunting ground, and for the residence of such of them as should, in this time of war, remove from the French. Accordingly, they appointed John Shickelamy to take care of this land. On July 9 they confirmed the covenant of 1736 to sell no land within the limits of Pennsylvania except to the Proprietaries.

THE FRENCH INVASION

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Meanwhile Captain McKay, with an independent company from South Carolina, had reinforced Washington at Fort Necesssity; so that the force there was about 400 men. On July 3, De Villier, of whose approach they were ignorant until the day before, with 900 French and many Indians, bombarded them from eleven in the morning until night, when he offered them terms, which they accepted, to go out with the honors of war the next day, leaving their cannon, and engaging to deliver to Fort Du Quesne the prisoners taken at the time Jumonville was killed. On hearing of this, Governor Dinwiddie ordered his troops gathering for the expedition to meet at Will's creek, and thence proceed to recapture the fort; but, if that should be impossible, then to build a fort at Red Stone creek or elsewhere, as determined by a council of war. He wrote to Hamilton that he wished two or three companies from Pennsylvania. The Assembly voted 15,000*l.* to the King's use the day after this letter was received, amended the bill, at Hamilton's request, so as to enable his successor to receive the money, and, rejecting all other amendments, forced Hamilton to sign the bill, although it was pretty much the same as he had rejected a year before. The Half-King and Scarrooyady, with some other Indians and their families, made their way to Croghan's at Aughwick, and sent messengers to gather in the Delawares and Shawanees, asking that the women and children be supported while the warriors fought for the English, whom they anxiously expected speedily to take decisive steps against the French. Several Delawares who had visited Fort Necessity since its capture also arrived at Croghan's, and through these Robert Strobo, who had been left at Fort Necessity as a hostage, managed to send letters to the effect that 100 trusty Indians might be able to surprise the fort by secreting themselves under the platform behind the palisades, as they had access to the fort all day, and killing the guard with their tomahawks in the night. Contrecoeur and a guard of 40 men and officers were all that dwelt in the fort; the rest were in bark cabins around; large detachments had been sent off, so the whole force was much reduced. Strobo bravely asked that his safety be not considered. We do not know that the execution of the scheme was attempted, except that Hamilton wrote to Croghan to let no liquor get to the Indians, to stave in every cask, and furnish the names of all who brought any. Conrad Weiser was sent with 300*l.* to spend for the Indians' support, and keep them friendly. He found twenty cabins containing over 200 men, women, and children at Aughwick, and a number more within a few miles. He received assurances that the Delawares, Shawanees, and allies were friendly, and that the Shawanees, grateful for the return of certain of their people imprisoned in South Carolina, had given no answer to the French, who asked them to assist against the English, or be neutral; and that both tribes would await the orders of the Six Nations. He reported that it was impossible to keep the inhabitants of Cumberland county from selling liquor to the Indians, the magistrates, it was said, selling the most. One old hypocrite coming to Aughwick for the purpose, it was supposed, of collecting the money for what he had sold, said to Weiser that the government should not let any liquor be brought there. Weiser asked if he meant for the Governor himself to come with his sword and pistol to prevent it. No, he did not. "Then," said Weiser, "there is no other way than to break you all and put others in commission who are no whisky traders and will exercise their authority." Tanacharisson complained of the great personage of American history, then first being heard of in England. Washington, a good-natured man without experience, he said, commanded the Indians as his slaves, had them always out scouting, and took no advice from them, lay in one place from one full moon to another, and made no fortifications at all, but "that little thing on the Meadow;" had he made such fortifications as Tanacharisson advised, he would have beaten off the French; the French had acted as great cowards, but the English as fools in that engagement. The Indians would wait at Aughwick until they heard from the new Governor, while Scarrooyady would go in the English interest to the great council fire of the Six Nations.

THE FRENCH INVASION

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Remains of Old Magazine at Fort Augusta in 1896

Reproduced by courtesy of the Wyoming Historical and Geological Society

THE FRENCH INVASION

Hamilton having asked to be superseded, Robert Hunter Morris arrived, October 3, from England. He was son of Lewis Morris, once Governor of New Jersey, and had been himself Chief Justice of that Province. He sent a polite message to the Indians, and the Assembly enabled him to assure them that he would maintain their people left behind while some of them went to Onondaga.

The King of England, although ostensibly at peace with France, decided to send two military expeditions against the latter's subjects, and ordered two regiments of foot, each of 500 men, besides the officers, commanded by Sir Peter Halket and Thomas Dunbar, respectively, to proceed from Ireland to Virginia, and there be increased to 750 men each, and two regiments to be recruited in America of 1,000 men each, to be commanded by Governor Shirley of Massachusetts and Sir William Pepperrell, respectively; towards this enlistment of about 3,000 men and supplying victuals and necessities for traveling and a common fund for the common defense, Pennsylvania was to do her share. To superintend this war as commander-in-chief in America, Edward Braddock, a general officer of reputation, was sent from England. He was to lead Halket's and Dunbar's regiments and their Provincial auxiliaries against the French on the Ohio, while Shirley and Pepperrell were to carry on campaigns elsewhere. It had been suggested that a certain American governor, recommended for his integrity, who, we suppose, was Dinwiddie, should command the expedition against the Ohio, but King George II said: "A little more ability and a little less honesty upon the present occasion may serve our turn better." Shirley's son, shortly before losing his life as Braddock's secretary, thought it a pity that such a view had not been applied to the case of the very honest Braddock.

Scarrooyady came to Philadelphia, his heart set on war, and arranged for a meeting of the Six Nations at Winchester in the spring. Before he left, John Shickcalamy's belt from Shamokin arrived with a message that white people from the other side of New York were coming to settle on land at Wyoming and north of the Western branch, over which the Six Nations at the treaty at Albany had given him charge, and that the strangers claimed to have bought it from the Six Nations since the treaty. Scar-rooyady was thereupon intrusted with a further message to the Six Nations to the effect that if they had actually sold these lands it was a breach of faith. Some people then beyond the mountains in Northampton county took shares in the Connecticut adventure; but on the other hand Governor Fitch of Connecticut disavowed any authorization for it. About 300 Indians of the Six Nations on the Ohio had fled from the French to the branches of the Susquehanna, and these sent word that they would kill the cattle of any whites who settled there, and if the latter still remained, would treat them as enemies and destroy them. Hendrick Peter, chief of the Mohawks, came to Philadelphia, and planned a general council between the Six Nations and the government of Connecticut to destroy the fraudulent deed under which the intruders claimed. He complained of bad treatment in the matter of land by the government of New York, and told how liberal the French were to the Indians, so much so as to have made some division in the Six Nations; but he and his companions, on leaving Philadelphia, gave hearty thanks for the entertainments and kindness which they had received, declaring that the people of Pennsylvania had treated them like brothers and sisters, and that the Governor could depend upon the fidelity of the Mohawks for counsel or action.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Two hundred Pennsylvanians soon enlisted in the regiment of Governor Shirley, and the Assembly, on the rejection of its first bill to raise 25,000*l.*, intrusted a committee with 5,000*l.*, raised by negotiating drafts bearing interest against the money due the Province, so as to purchase all the flour required for the army expected at Will's creek, where Colonel Innes had made a fort. Sir John St. Clair, a Scotch baronet, the quartermaster, had already arrived in America. Some years after this he married Miss Moland of Philadelphia. The Assembly, however, was not disposed to lay a tax which would pay off the necessary bills of credit in five years, nor would it grant 40,000*l.* in bills of credit for the raising of troops, both propositions being made by the Lieutenant-Governor and supported by Franklin. Twenty-five thousand pounds were voted, but only 5,000*l.* were subjected to General Braddock's order, the balance to be applied by a committee of the House in the following manner: 5,000*l.* for provisions for the forces in Virginia, 10,000*l.* for provisions for the forces in New England, and 5,000*l.* for subsistence of the refugee Indians, clearing of roads, hire of carriages, and other contingent expenses.

THE FRENCH INVASION

House of Conrad Weiser, Reading

Engraved especially for this work from a photograph in possession of Dr. W. J. Holland

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Morris declared that to give the disposition of the public money to members of the Assembly would be inconsistent with his duty to the Crown, and he would show the bill to his superiors in London. The Assembly decided in its turn to appeal to His Majesty, and sent over to England a representation of the case.

To raise without delay the money necessary at this time of imminent danger, the Assembly appointed certain persons to draw drafts to the amount of 10,000*l.* on the provincial treasurer or trustees of the loan office, payable in one year, with interest, and apply these, or, in fact, the proceeds of negotiating these, to the King's use. But the intention of the British government was to have a common fund established by contributions from all the colonies, out of which the additional men for Halket's and Dunbar's regiments and those in Nova Scotia, should be provided for. The Assembly told Morris, on May 20, that, while the bill he had rejected had given Braddock the disposal of 5,000*l.* and appropriated the whole 25,000*l.* for the army's benefit, no other colony, could the members learn, had offered him power over as many pence as they had pounds; and that they could not look upon the Governor as a friend to his country while he was "endeavoring to render the inhabitants of Pennsylvania odious to our gracious sovereign and his ministers, to the British nation, to all the neighboring colonies, and to the army that is come to protect us." British officers were much stirred up against the colony. Sir John St. Clair met the commissioners appointed by Morris to lay out the roads from Carlisle to the three forks of the Youghiogheny and to Will's creek, and, the commissioners said, "stormed like a lion rampant." He declared that they should have been appointed to the work in January, the want of this road and of the provisions promised by Pennsylvania had retarded the expedition, and cost many lives, because of the fresh numbers of French likely to arrive; for his part he would, instead of marching to the Ohio, march in nine days into Cumberland County, and by fire and sword force the inhabitants to make roads, and would seize horses and wagons, etc.; he would to-morrow write to England, and shake Mr. Penn's Proprietaryship, etc. Benjamin Franklin went to see Braddock to disabuse his mind as to the Assembly, and, meeting him at Frederick, Maryland, succeeded. Then Franklin heard that there had been collected only 25 wagons when 150 were required, to transport the stores, baggage, etc. Braddock and his officers were in despair. Franklin said it was a pity that the troops had not been landed in Pennsylvania, where every farmer had his wagon. Braddock at once begged Franklin, as a man of influence there, to procure what was indispensable. Franklin went to Lancaster, published an offer of 15s. a day for each wagon with a driver and four horses, and 2s. a day for each horse with a pack saddle or other saddle, and 18d. for a horse without a saddle, all to be at Will's creek by May 20, seven days' pay to be advanced, if desired, at the time of hiring, the drivers not to serve as soldiers. Franklin stayed several days in Lancaster and two days in York to receive offers; his son attending to the offers in Cumberland County. A letter signed by that wonderful man showed the people of the back counties that here was a chance for obtaining a large amount of gold and silver currency for easy work by those who served in it, and that if this plan did not succeed in fourteen days, the General would be notified and the soldiers would seize the best carriages and horses, and, perhaps, without compensation. The wagons were secured. The owners said that they did not know Braddock, but would take Franklin's bond. At his suggestion, moreover, the committee of the Assembly sent twenty packs of groceries on horses to as many subaltern officers, these arriving as soon as the wagons. Rev. Richard Peters, secretary of the Governor's Council, who went to hurry the construction of the roads, found 108 men at work, but the commissioners discouraged for want of cash, "rum and carriage" being too high, he agreed for what was necessary at moderate prices. He ordered the road to be cut no wider than twelve feet, and only the one to the forks to be pushed, and told Braddock that he must furnish an escort to protect the men, who could not be kept together a single day in case of any alarm from Indians; moreover, the General would find his own march difficult, if Indians were induced by the French to annoy him, and, against them, he would be unable to reach Fort Duquesne without a body of Indian allies and several companies of rangers, both foot and mounted. Braddock despised this fear of Indians, and said that the Province might, but he could not, send men to protect the road cutters. At that time, the troops were short of provisions; in the tents of the officers Peters saw no butter and little fresh meat, and the General's own fare was scanty, and his beef was not sweet. Scarrooyady and about forty Indians were at camp, mad at not being consulted, and with trouble likely to arise from the scandalous behavior of the officers with the squaws; so that Peters induced Braddock to send the Indian women home, and to forbid their presence in future. All but seven warriors left to escort these to Aughwick; and, when the army had gotten off, and murders along Will's creek began, it was suspected that, not the French Indians, to whom they were attributed, but these friendly Indians committed them. The General sent, moreover, the soldiers' wives into Pennsylvania, to be supported by the Province, except so far as one-third of the husbands' pay would suffice.

THE FRENCH INVASION

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

On June 6, there having been no rain for two or three months, as well as in view of the starting of Braddock's expedition, Governor Morris appointed June 19 as a day of fasting and prayer.

The army left Will's creek on June 14, and in two days reached Little Meadows, whither St. Clair and Major Chapman had preceded them, erecting a fort there. On the advice of Washington, who was serving as one of Braddock's military family, the General determined to make haste with 1,200 chosen men under Sir Peter Halket, Lieut.-Col. Gage, Lieut.-Col. Burton and Major Sparks, with only such wagons as were necessary; St. Clair starting with one-third the force on the 17th, and Braddock

George II

King of England from 1727 to 1760

THE FRENCH INVASION

with 800 men the next day, leaving to follow them some days later Colonel Dunbar, Major Chapman, and the residue of the two regiments with some independent companies, women, etc. From Governor Sharpe's letter we learn that before June 22, the advance guard discovered a small body of French, who captured Scarrooyady, but on the troops coming up fell back and let him escape. From Edward Shippen's letter we learn that St. Clair beat off 200 or 300 French Indians. The 1,200, "halting to level every mole hill and erect bridges over every brook," made only twelve miles in four days. Washington, who was too sick to go on horseback, was left behind, but rejoined Braddock on July 8. On the 9th this force, largely of regular troops, was attacked by 250 French and 650 Indians, just after it had crossed the Monongahela, the second time that day, about seven miles from Fort DuQuesne. The British army was in three divisions. The first, of 300 men with two cannon, had been sent across the river under Thomas Gage, then Lieutenant-Colonel, afterwards the celebrated General, to secure the house and plantation of James Frazier, a trader, not far from a ruin named after him. On finding the river muddy, Gage suspected that it had just been crossed by the enemy, and, on crossing, he found many footprints; so he warned Braddock, although possessing himself of the plantation without opposition. The second division, being the road makers, 200 strong, under St. Clair, was closely following, and the remaining 800 under Braddock himself with the artillery had made the crossing, when Gage's 300, ascending a hill at a place where a ravine on each side concealed the foe, were suddenly fired at from behind trees and bushes. There are various accounts of the battle. If the reader takes up that written by Orme, the aid-de-camp, and published by the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, let it be remembered that Orme's influence over his General was blamed for the result. When the British returned the enemy's fire, 100 Canadian militiamen, being nearly half the whites at the attack, ran away, crying

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

"Sauve qui peut," and headed by two cadets. Braddock hurried forward with Burton and 400 men, while at the third volley of musketry, Beaujeu, the French commander, was killed, and with the bringing of cannon into play, the savages retired from within range. Dumas ordered them to attack on the flank. Charles Langlade led them. The British found themselves assailed from nearly all directions, their fire apparently making no impression, the enemy apparently in vast numbers, their own officers falling. Those familiar with Indian warfare wished to distribute themselves among the trees, but Braddock would not permit it, even striking some of them with his sword and calling them cowards. His secretary, Governor Shirley's son, was killed, two of his aids-de-camp were wounded. Washington, his other aid-de-camp, had two horses shot under him, and four bullet holes in his coat. St. Clair was wounded. Halket, who had command of the rear well posted, Orme says, around the baggage, was killed, and his men ran back in confusion. The wagoneers, separating the horses they mounted from the rest of the teams, abandoned everything. The provincial soldiers behaved very well. The French captured the artillery, and the English recaptured it, but could not bring it away owing to the loss of the horses. The regulars, however, in the confusion, half the time seeing no enemy, became panic stricken, gathering into groups and firing at friend and foe alike before precipitate flight, nor could they be rallied to save the lighter things. The officers, united in squads or else singly, advanced against the enemy, as an example to the common soldiers; but only sacrificed themselves. In the course of three hours sixty officers were killed or wounded. Braddock himself was mortally wounded. His money, papers, and letters were among the loot secured by the victors. Only about 300 sound men remained to retreat and unite with Dunbar, who, impeded with the heavy baggage, was in camp forty miles behind. Braddock was carried to Great Meadows, where he died on the 13th. Before daybreak his body was buried, Washington reading the burial service. Dunbar did not feel strong enough to confront the enemy, and so, after destroying his ammunition and most of his provisions, moved back to Fort Cumberland; and the 100 men guarding those employed in cutting the road were notified to make no

THE FRENCH INVASION

Chimney Rocks

Blair County; said to have been a resort of Chief Logan and his Indians further advance, but join him at the same fort. Thus the country west of the Alleghanies was left to the French and their Indian allies, who were free, moreover, to reinforce those who were opposing the English expedition to Niagara. Greater still was the dismay when Dunbar decided to take the remains of the two regiments to Philadelphia and spend the winter there. Leaving the independent companies to garrison the fort and take care of 400 wounded, he with 1,200 men, an ample army in those days to protect the frontier, started for the safest part of the Province, against the protest of the Governor and Assembly, and with the population west of the Susquehanna forsaking their houses and unusually good crops.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Morris, finding that the Assembly, in raising money for defence, was likely to tax the Proprietary estates, thought he might create some popularity for his superiors, as well as promote recruiting, by offering land as an additional encouragement to those who would enlist in an expedition against the French on the Ohio; he therefore sent a message to the Assembly on July 20, promising 1,000 acres to a colonel, 750 to a lieutenant-colonel, 500 to a captain, 400 to a lieutenant or ensign, and 200 to a common soldier, on condition of settlement in three years after the removal of the French, to be free of quit rent for fifteen years from March 1, 1756. Morris, after starting a fort at Carlisle and another at Shippensburg, and forming four companies of militia, wrote to Dunbar and to Governor Shirley, who had succeeded Braddock as commander-in-chief, asking that such troops as were not needed at Fort Cumberland be posted at Carlisle, Shippensburg, and McDowell's Mill, at which last named place the new road to the Alleghanies began. The Assembly passed a bill on August 5, to raise 50,000*l.* for the King's use by a tax for two years of 12*d.* yearly per l. on all estates, real and personal, and 20*s.* yearly per head on all taxables. Morris proposed an amendment exempting the Proprietary estates. The Assembly asked whether he was restricted by the Proprietaries' instructions against passing the bill as it stood, or he himself was of opinion that the amendment was right. Morris replied that his commission contained a proviso that he should not have power to do or consent to an act whereby the estate or property of the Proprietaries might be hurt or incumbered; therefore he deemed that any law contrary to such proviso would be void; he, moreover, would have thought it his duty to have the estates exempted, because, 1st, all Governors hereditary or otherwise were exempt;

THE FRENCH INVASION

2nd, a law of the Province expressly declared such estates not liable for rates and taxes; 3rd, the Proprietaries having by their Governor consented to a law vesting in the people the choice of persons to assess and lay taxes in the several counties, without reserving any negative over such choice, it would be unreasonable to empower such persons to tax these estates at discretion; 4th, to tax them was contrary to the general practice in such governments. The reader would doubtless agree with the Assembly's declaiming against the injustice, had we space to make extracts from its well prepared messages. The law of the province then in force exempting the estates, concerned levies for paying assemblymen's wages and rewards for killing wolves, crows, and foxes and other purposes more immediately for the benefit of the inhabitants. As to what seems the strongest point made by Morris, that the Proprietaries had no voice in choosing the assessors, the latter, it was shown, were bound by oath or affirmation to value the lands impartially, and the Proprietaries had enough officers and dependents in every county to cast a proportion of the whole vote for assessors equal to their proportion of the tax. Morris on August 9 asked the Assembly to pass a militia law. On the 16th, as the treasury was exhausted, Morris told the Assembly that he would pass a bill for striking any sum in paper money that the present exigencies might require, if such paper money was to be sunk in five years.

Shirley, on August 12, ordered Dunbar to make a further attempt to capture Fort Duquesne with the troops he had, and such reinforcements as Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia should raise; and, if successful, after garrisoning it, to proceed against Fort Presque Isle; if unsuccessful in both attempts, then to cover the frontier of Pennsylvania. Morris, on hearing this, despaired of raising any colonial troops; nothing, he felt, would be appropriated by the Assembly, and Maryland and Virginia would not act if Pennsylvania held back; so he advised Dunbar to come to Philadelphia, whence he could either go on to Albany, or, if the Duquesne expedition were practicable, go easily to Carlisle and meet the reinforcements there; he thought Niagara the most important point to possess.

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

Dunbar and his troops spent about a month in Philadelphia, receiving many recruits. By General Shirley's order he could not accept any indentured servants who offered themselves. When, some time later, to hasten the filling up of certain regiments, this order was rescinded, the masters complained to the Assembly, and the latter to the Lieutenant-Governor, saying that it presumed no colony on the continent had furnished more free recruits than Pennsylvania, where great numbers had been raised for Shirley's and Pepperrell's regiments, for Halket's and Dunbar's, for the New York and Carolina Independent Companies, for Nova Scotia, and even for the West Indies. If the property in the service of indentured persons were not respected the people would be driven to buy negro slaves, of which there were few here, and the Province, instead of growing by the increase of white inhabitants, would be weakened, as every slave was a domestic enemy.

Index

- Acrod, Benjamin, 399
- Act for better arministration of Justice, 362 for collection of quit rents, 354 of Union, 266
- Acts of assembly, passage of five, 332
- Adolphus, Gustavus, 67; death of, 68
- Agreement between Risingh and Stuyvesant, 196 of Proprietors, 194; provisions of, 195, 196
- Agriculture at New Sweden, 86
- Aix-la-Chapelle, treaty of, 411; conditions of, 415
- Alarm, a false, created, 356, 357
- Albany, efforts at, to dispossess Penn, 294 fear of fur trade diversion from, 292 meeting of congress at, 334 troops for, 400
- Algonkian Indians, 34
- Allen, Nathaniel, 217
- Alrich, Governor Jacob, 113
- Alrich, Peter, 275; appointment of as schout, 160; grant of land to, 146; permission of, to trade, 146; servants of, killed, 151, 152
- Amity, arrival of the, 242 sailing of the, 218
- Amsterdam, purchase of claims on the Delaware by, 113
- Andersson, Peter, 75
- Andries, Lace, 162
- Andros, Governor, 173; administration of, 162; visit of, to the Delaware, 161
- Appropriation for a fort, 418 for defense of Louisburg, 399 for the King, 390 for the King's use, 400, 442 for military purposes, 433 for the Queen, 360, 361
- Appropriation for support of the Indians, 428 for war purposes, 427
- Appropriations, methods of raising, 434
- Arcts, Lenart, 306
- Argall, Captain Samuel, 39-40
- Army at Will's Creek, supplies for, 432
- Ashcorn, Charles, 301
- Assembly, act of, 362 act of, appropriating money, 442 act for issuing bills of credit, 423 adjournment of the, 351 and Hamilton, dispute between, 412 and Morris, difference between the, 434 a new, elected, 361 appeal of the, to England, 434 appeal of, for defence, 408 bill of, for issue of bills of credit, 412 course of, in war with France, 399 dissolution of the, 283 first meeting of, 264, 265 first deputies to, 265 functions of, in law making, 320 grant of tax by, 327 Keith's allegiance to, 368 meeting of, at New Castle, 337 membership of, 407, 408 number of members of, 275 policy of, with Indians, 418 privileges of, confirmed, 351 proceedings of, on bills of credit, 387 qualifications of deputies, 267
Quaker influence in, 390 range of legislation by, 277 second meeting of the, 272, 273 speaker of the first, 274 special session of the, 357

INDEX

- Assembly, summoned by Penn. 337 summoning of, 332 tax levied by, 338
 the first, 263, 264
- Athanasian orthodoxy, acceptance of, 354
- Attack upon Fort Duquesne, 439, 440
- Balding, Theo., 301
- Baltimore, Lord, 200, 201, 238-239, 254 application of, for grant, 381 boundary troubles with, 380-386 fifth, boundary agreement by, 382 claims of, 379 genealogy of, 238 foot note land purchase by, 243 meeting of, with Penn. 270, 271 petition of, to the king, 383 return of, to England, 383
- Bankson, Andreas, 217
- Baptist denomination, cause of growth of the, 316, 317
- Barber, John, 253
- Barclay, Robert, 199; apology of, 309
- Barents, Christian, death of, 113
- Barker, Wharton, 323
- Bartholomew, George, landlord, 257
- Battery, establishment of, 408
 Franklin's lottery for a, 411
- Bayard, Nicholas, 294
- Beazor, John, 241
- Beckman, William, 116, 117; letter of, 123; reports of, 117
- Beginnings of Penn's Colony, the, 236
- Bengston, Andreas, 275, 296
- Berkely, Lord John, 194
- Berks county, formation of, 412
- Bezar, John, 217
- Bienville, Celeron de, 416
- Biggs, John, 265
- Biles, William, 237, 273, 322; jailing of, 355; prosecution of, 353
- Bills of credit, 387
 offer to issue, 400 refusal of assembly to issue, 433
- Binckes, Jacob, 160
- Births on board the Welcome, 253
- Blackwell, Capt. John, 313; opposition to by Quakers, 314; relieved as deputy-governor, 315
- Block, Captain Adrian, 40, 43
- Blue Anchor tavern, the, 257
- Blunston, John, 288, 296, 343
- Blunston, Samuel, proprietaries' agent, 383
- Boarding-house charges in 1682, 241
- Body of laws, provisions of, 266-270
- Boghardt, Jost de, 79
- Bonde, Anders Svensson, sketch of, 75
- Boumat, Louis, 302
- Boundary between Connecticut and New York, 413 between Pennsylvania and Virginia, 414 claims, early, 200 difficulties, the, 379-386 disputes, 413, 414 line, details of the, 382 line, the Maryland, 238 question, settlement of, 413 question, Virginia interest in the, 414
 the Connecticut, 413
- Bovington, Richard, 171
- Braddock, Gen. Edward, 390; arrival of, 431;
 death of, 440;
 burial of, 441
- Braddock's expedition, 435-441 expedition, letters in relation to, 439 forces, division of, 436, 439 opinion of Indians, 436
- Brassey, Thomas, 265
- Brick-making at New Amstel, 115
- Bringhurst, John, 391
- British Factor, sailing of the, 218
- Bristow, John, 315
- British war vessel, appeal for a, 411
- Brockholls, Capt. Anthony, 236
- Brown, James, 334
- Brulé, Etienne, 35-36
 Etienne, entrance of into Pennsylvania, 36, 39
- Buck's county, deputies from, 265
- Budd, Thomas, 320
- Burial ground, early, 83
- Burlington, story of settlement of, 196
- Burying grounds, land for, 372
- Byllinge, Edward, 194
- Cadwalader, John, 258 foot note
- Call for men for the Canada expedition, 360
- Callowhill, Thomas, 322, 363
- Calvert, Cecilus, 370
 George, first Lord Baltimore, 117
- Campanius, Rev. John, arrival of, at New Sweden, 81
- Cantwell, Edmund, 255, 273
- Carolus, Laurentius, 176

INDEX

- Carpenter, Joshua, 336
 Samuel, 307, 315, 323, 340, 343, 361;
 assistant lieutenant-governor, 328
- Carr, Capt. John, commander at New Castle, 146
 Sir Robert, report of, 143
- Carteret, Sir George, 194
 Gov. Philip, 162
- Cartier, Jacques, explorations of, 35
- Cape Henlopen, 220
- Capes May and Henlopen, naming of, 40
- Carlisle, building of a fort at, 442
- Cattle, branding and recording of, 278
- Caves in Philadelphia as dwellings, 261
- Central government, provision for, 425
- Champlain, Samuel, 35; journal of, 36, 39; operations of against the Iroquois, 38-39
- Charles I, commission of, to Thomas Yong, 62
 grant by, to Sir Edmund Plowden, 59, 60
- Charles II, 191, 199; charter from to Penn, 381
- Charles X, death of, 107
- Charter, a new, for Philadelphia, 343, 344 desire for a new, 275, 276 features of the new, 277 framing of a new, 276 of Pennsylvania, 221-235 of privileges, provisions of the, 340, 341 of property, preparation of, 344 property, veto of, 345 signing of the new, 276
- Chesapeake Bay, early description of, 31-2
- Chester county, division of, 372 deputies from, 265
 renamed from Upland, 255
- Christ church, closing of, 355
- Christian Quakers, the, 320
- Christina, character of Swedes at, 80 and Fort Nassau, rivalry between, 76 fur trade at, 16 lack of horses and cattle at, 80 naming of, 71
 renamed, 111, 112
- Church at Tinieum Island, 176 of England, non-existent in Pennsylvania, 309 of Sweden, the, 308
 first in Pennsylvania, 81
- Churches, early, 175, 176
- Claim of Dutch purchase on site of Philadelphia, 59 of the heir-at-law, the, 363-373
- Clark, William, 265, 273, 343
- Claypoole, James, 220, 310, 323; letter from, 242
- Claypoole, John, 296
- Clayton, James, 405
 William, 173, 236, 273
- Clergy, the early, 308, 309 before the Revolution, 309
- Cock, John, 301
 Lasse, 236, 273, 288
 Otto, Ernest, 162, 236
 Peter, 114, 162, 288; collector of tolls, 133
- Code of laws enacted, 265, 266
- Cole, Josiah, 193, 199
- Coleman, Henry, sedition of, 146, 147
- Collier, Capt. John, "commander," 171
- Collision between the Swedes and the Dutch, 97
- Colonial commissioners, 195 union recommended, 426
- Colonies, early trade of, 299 efforts for a union of, 334 plan for union of, 425 state of, 425
- Colonists, alleged grievances of, 338 arrival of in 1631, 50
 from Wales and Germany, 302
- Colony, early development of, 295, 296 constitutional basis of the, 279, 280 trouble in, 146, 147
- Colve, Capt. Anthony, as governor of New York, 160
- Commerce, tribute demanded of, 357
- Commission of property, members of, 343 to meet Indians at Albany, 399 to try criminals, 347 and powers of deputy-governor, 312
- Commissioners of property, 310
 the boundary, 382, 383
- Committee to address the proprietary, 352 to read Logan's letter, 391
- Concord, arrival of the, 220
- Condition of early settlers, 174
- Conditions and Concessions, 274
- Conference between Stuyvesant and Swedes, 113, 114
- Confinement, places for, 278

PENNSYLVANIA COLONIAL & FEDERAL

- Conflict between the Dutch and the Swedes, 93, 94
- Congress at Albany, proceedings of, 425; representation by, 425, 426 meeting of at Albany, 334
- Coolin, Annakey, 301
- Cook, Arthur, 312, 316; presentation of commission by, 324
- Coppock, Bartholomew, 315
- Cornbury, Lord, 358
- Coroner's inquest, an early, 299
- Corsen, Arent, arrival of, at Fort Nassau, 59
- Cosard, Lees, 302
- Council, action of regarding a school, 299, 300
and assembly, dissolution of, 331 appointment of, by Markham, 312
as Penn's deputy, 315
in Maryland, 121, 122 lower county members, desertion from, 316 minutes of the, 274, 275, 297-301 of Governor Nicolls, 146 of nine, assembling of, 236; names
of, 236
of state, a new, 343; duties of, 344 of Upland, organization of, 237 opportunity of, to choose president, 315
Penn's propositions to, 316 powers of the, 376 seizure of a ship by, 296, 299 succession of, to Gov. Hamilton, 147
- Counterfeiting, an early example of, 296
- County courts, early appeals from, 296 employment of the title, 174
- Court at Upland, a new, 237; jurisdiction of, 173
business in early years, 163-166 of admiralty, opposition to, 315, 336 of chancery, cases before the, 376; establishment of, 368 of equity, 376
- Courtland, Stephen, 294
- Courts, early, 162 proceedings of, declared void, 351 range of business of, 162
- Coxe, Col. Daniel, 323
- Crefeld company, the, 306 immigrants from, 305
- Cresap, Thomas, operations of, 382-386; arrest of, 385
- Cresap's migration project, 384, 385
- Crisis in Dutch and Swedish affairs, 97, 98
- Crispin, William, 217
- Croghan, George, Indian agent, 417, 420
- Cumberland county, formation of, 412
- Currency, silver, 163
- Curtis, Joseph, 288
- Dankers, Jasper, 180
- Dankers' and Sluyter's journal, 180-187
- Dare, William, landlord, 257
- David, Rev. Hugh, anecdote of, 406, 407
- Dawson, Thomas, Baron Dartrey, 406
- Death penalty, the, 268
- Death on board the Welcome, 253
- Decay of forts at Christina and Tinicum, 112
- Defense of the province, 357
- De Haes, John, 275
- Delavall, John, 316, 324
- Delaware and Maryland, relations of, 379 and Pennsylvania, act uniting, 265 Bay and river, first permanent white settlement on, 73
Bay, existence of, first learned, 34
Bay, naming of, 40
Bay, or river, first settlement on, 53 colony, delivery of, to Penn, 255 colony, extension of, 148 colony, submission of to the Dutch, 160 conditions on, 143 number of white people on west bank of, 134 river, description of by De Vries, 56 river, distress on, 144 river, first minister on, 76 river, location of colonists on, 134 river renamed, 62 river, reviving activity on the, 172, 173 territory, deeds of, 262 the, plundering on, 159
trade on the, 156
- Deputy-governor, opposition to, 314 arrival of a new, 313
- De Vries, arrival of his party on the Walrus, 50
ascent of Delaware river by, 54, 55
David Peterson, sketch of, 53

INDEX

- De Vries, description of country by, 55
description of Delaware river by, 56 intercourse of, with the Indians, 54, 56
journal of, 81-85
De Vries's party, settlement of, 50
D'Hinoyossa, Alexander, 122 cession of the South River to, 133 settlement of, in Maryland, 141, 144 surrenders to the Duke of York, 133, 154
Dickinson, John, 123
Jcnathan, 307
Domestic animals, need of, 115
Dongan, Col. Thomas, 290, 291 release of land by, to Penn, 291
Draper, Alexander, 265
Drew, Roger, 218
Drewet, Morgan, 236
Drunkenness, a punishable offense, 268
Drystreet, Henry, 301
Dueling, prohibition of, 269
Duke of York, 192, 194, 207, 209, 220, 291, 293 administration under, 115-187 deeds issued by, 220 loss of title by, 161
new patent to, 161
surrender to, of Manhattan, 133 Duke's laws, establishment and character
of, 145, 262
Dulany, Daniel, 185
Dunbar, Thomas, 411
Dutch agriculture, slow progress of, 113 and English, rival claims of, 66 and Marylanders, conference between, 119
and Swedes, absorption of, 307; conference between the, 71 attempts of, to control Swedes, 131, 132 authority, center of, 111 authority on the Delaware, 112 characteristics of, 261 claims on the South River, 72 colonists, arrival of, at Christina, 79 colony, sickness and distress in, 113, 114 commission to examine South River conditions, 120 confirmation of sale of land to, 94 conflict of, with Swedes, 94
Dutch East India Company, 35 expedition, arrival of, 113 feebleness on the Delaware, 92, 91 oath of allegiance by, 143 officials, lands of, distributed, 142 purchase from Indians, 117 Reformed faith, 173, 176 rule, brevity of, 166 rule in Pennsylvania, 111
settlement, the, 111 settlers ordered to depart from Delaware bay, 199 settlers threatened by Virginia force, 65 territory, disadvantage of division of, 133
trade, increase of, in America, 48 trade, on South River, 56
West India Company, 93
Dwelling houses, early, 180, 181
Earl of Bellomont, 135 of Holderness, 419 of Shewsbury, the, 114 of Sunderland, 199, 381; letter to, 295
Early conditions, 259 food resources, 272 surveying, 241, 242
Eckley, John, 312, 323
Education, early efforts for, 279 in court, 164
Elfsberg fort, 196
Embargo, effect of an, on Philadelphia, 403
Emigrants, blending of descendants of, 307
Emigration to Pennsylvania, 220
England and Holland, peace between, 101, 144; war between, 139-143, 159 colonial policy of, 209 consolidation of power of, 136 political conditions in, 207, 208 traditional policy of, 135
England's forces, plunder by, 142
English and Dutch, rival claims of, 66 claims, 135
fleet on the Delaware, 141 fleet, sailing of for America, 140 fleet, vessels of, 140
immigration, 172
-Irish, the, 307 laws, establishment of, 145 occupancy on the Delaware, 196

INDEX

- English purposes, warnings of, to the Dutch, 135 settlement, brief existence of, 80 settlement, the, 307-324 settlers at Upland, 168, 171 settlers, from New Haven, 79 settlers, qualifications of, 308 trade, expansion of, 136 trade restrictions in favor of, 136 troops, criticism of, 428
 Enlisted servants, number of, 390
 Episcopal church, the oldest, 119
 "Essex House," 171
 Evans, John, arrival of, 351; antagonizes the assembly, 351; obnoxious measures of, as governor, 357, 358
 Evelin, Robert, arrival of, 59; description of the country by, 64; explorations of, 63
 Everts, Cornelius, 169
 Exchange, rate of, 371 Expedition of Dutch colonists, 111
 the tenth Swedish, 167 to New Sweden, the ninth, 100
 Exports, early, 116
 Fabritius, Jacobus, 176
 Fairman, Thomas, 173, 216, 241
 Fasting, day of, 411
 Fences, provisions for height of, 278
 Fendall, Josias, 119
 Fenwick, John, 194, 196
 Fermor, Thomas, Earl of Pomfret, 406
 Ferries, establishment of, ordered, 279
 Feudal lordship, release of, 377
 Field, John, 363
 Finance under Thomas, 387
 Finland, colonists from, 81
 Finney, Samuel, 343
 Finns, arrival of, 80
 Fire, act for prevention of, 332 company in defense of Philadelphia, 411 engine, a novel, 411
 First church in limits of Pennsylvania, 83 issue of paper money, the, 368, 369 minister on the Delaware, 76 sail vessel on the great lakes, 179
 Swedish settlers, sketches of, 75 vessel built within limits of original Union, 40 white settlement in Pennsylvania, 82
 Fish, early supply of, 240, 241
 Fitzwater, Thomas, 253, 275, 296
 Five Nations, the, 6; peace with, 339
 Fletcher, Benjamin, 326; confirmation of laws by, 326 episode, the, 294, 295
 Governor, 316; call for men by, 328; lamentation of, 311
 Flower, Enoch, 296
 Ford, Philip, 334; claims of heirs of, 358
 Forgery by a high official, 356
 Fort advised on the Monongahela, 418 at Tinicum, decay of, 112 Beverseide building of, 94 building of, at Carlisle, 442 building of, by the Ohio Company, 416 built at Hoorn-kill, 117 built at Fort Little Meadows, 416
 Casimir, building of, 98; capture of, 101; capture of by the Dutch, 104; decay of, 113; name of, changed, 101; under the Dutch, 112
 Christina, building of, 71; decay of, 112; house building at, 72; siege of, 105; strengthened, 98; surrendered to the Dutch, 105 contribution for building a, 418
 Cumberland, retreat to, 441
 Duquesne, details of attack upon, 439-442; killed and wounded at, 440; preparations for march to, 435, 436; retreat from, 441; second attempt to capture, 443
 Elfsborg, 82; abandonment of, 98
 Korsholm, burning of, 102; strengthened, 98
 Nassau, 185; abandonment of by the Dutch, 98; a center of trade, 49; and Christina, rivalry between, 76; arrival of Capt. George Holmes at, 65; arrival of De Vries at, 54; defenders condition of, 65; determination to abandon it, 49; first place occupied by white men on the Delaware, 49; new commissary at, 93; recapture of, 65; situation of, 49
 Necessity, bombardment of, 427; garrison of, 427; surrender of, 427
 New Gottenburg, strengthened, 98
 New Korsholm, 82 of Nye (new) Gottenberg, 82

INDEX

- Fort on the Monongahela taken by the French, 424
 Trinity, 101
 Forts on the frontier, contribution for building, 339, 340
 Founder of Pennsylvania, the, 185 et 809
 Fourth expedition from Sweden to Christina, 80
 Fox, George, 189, 190, 193, 199, 322; description by, 148, 151; journal of, 155
 Frame of government, 263, 275; aspect of the, towards religion, 354, 355; the old and the new, 337
 Frankfort company, the, 305
 Franklin, Benjamin, 348, 420, 425; clerk, 408; conference of, with Braddock, 435; pamphlet by, 408; work of in obtaining army supplies, 435
 Franklin square, 258
 Franklin's plan for union, 425
 Franks, David, 354
 Frazier, James, 439
 Free Society of Traders, formation of the, 218, 220
 French aggressions, 425 basis of their claim, 415 battle with the, 424 claims, arrogance of, 420 claims on the Ohio, 416 contention, the, 416 fort at Casago, 419 in Canada, the, 35-36 invasion, the, 415 measures against the Indians, 418 measures to oppose the, 419 on the Allegheny, 415 the, in America, 415
 trading rights, 425
 John, 356, 358
 Friends in England, letter to, 352
 Friends' school, 319
 Fruits, early, 240
 Furly, Benjamin, 210, 211 (foot note), 306
 Fur trade at Manhattan, 40 beginning of, 8 fear of diversion from Albany, 292 prices governing the, 115, 116
 Furs, shipment of, 116
 Gage, Thomas, 439
 Galloway, Joseph, 324
 Game, early, 219
 General Assembly, election of, 262-264
 Geoffrey, arrival of the, 271; the sailing of, 230
 German and Welsh settlers, qualifications of the, 308 colonists, arrival of, 302
 immigration, 368
 land purchase, the first, 306 protestants, the, 308 settlers and Cresap, 383, 384 settlers, attempts to dispossess, 384 settlers of Germantown, 308 settlers, persecution of, 385 settlers, purchase of land by, 306 settlers, the first, 304, 306
 Gist, Christopher, 417
 Goodson, John, 316; assistant lieutenant-governor, 328; resignation of, 332
 Gookin, Charles, appointment of as lieutenant-governor, 359; groundless charges by, 361
 Gordon, Patrick, 355, 370; administration of, 371-373; commissioned lieutenant-governor, 370; death of, 376
 Gorsuch, Richard, grant to, 148
 Gouldney, Henry, 359, 361 Government, of Pennsylvania, beginning of, 237 of the colony organized, 262-270 how constituted, 332, 333
 new frame of, 332, 333
 Governor, appointments by, 300
 Dinwiddie, proclamation by, 423
 Hamilton, complaint to, 416
 Shirley, commander-in-chief, 442; offer of assistance by, 424 trials of the office of, 346
 Governor's Council, meeting of, 273; members of, 273
 Governorship of Thomas and Richard Penn, 407-414
 Graeme, Dr. Thomas, 372
 Graham, James, 290
 Grain, cultivation of, in New Sweden, 86
 Grand jury, the first in Pennsylvania, 296
 Grapes, the native, 302
 Graydon, Alexander, 388
 Great Britain, dominion of, 425
 Great law amended, 277, 278; provisions of, 266-270
 Great Treaty, the, 282-288 Griffin, building of the, 179; entry of on

INDEX

- Lake Erie, 179; voyage of up the lakes, 189
- Griffiths, Thomas, 390, 392
- Griffith, the, 196
- Gripen, the, return of, to Christina, 74
- Growth, Joseph, 323
Lawrence, 323, 408
- Guest, Alice, 257
John, 343
- Guilder, value of, 163 foot note
- Gunnarsson, Sven, sketch of, 75
- Hague, William, 241
- Haige, William, 218, 273, 290; visits Lord Baltimore, 244
- Halket, Sir Peter, 431, 436
- Hall, Col. Edward, 384
- Hamilton, Andrew, 372; chosen lieutenant-governor, 344; death of, 347
James, 408; commissioned, 411, 412
- Hanson, Mathys, 114
- Hardwicke, Lord Chancellor, decision by 412
- Harrison, James, 207, 273, 274, 322; Penn's letter to, 217; perjury of, 311
- Hartsfelder, Julian, 173
- Harvey, Sir John, 65
- Hasell, Samuel, 408
- Heathcote, Gilbert, 363
- Heermans (or Herman), Augustine, 120
- Heirs of Penn, 363
- Helm, Israel, interpreter, 162; justice, 166; supervisor of fur trade, 133
- Hendricks, John, 384
- Hendricksen, Cornelius, discoveries of, 44; report of, 43-44
- Hendrickson, Yeshoo, 300
- Herman, Augustine, 97; journal of, 121
Ephraim, 220, 254
Gasparus, 275
- Herriott, Thomas, 253
- Higginbotham, Charles, operations of, 385
- Hill, Richard, 324, 363; as speaker, 361; bravery of, 358; charges against, 361; death of, 372
- Hilliard, John, 273
- Hjort, Rev. Petrus, 109
- Holland and England, peace between, 144; war between, 159
- Hollender, Peter, commissioned governor, 76
- Holme, Thomas, 218, 242, 257, 265, 273, 288; sketch of, 322
- Holmes, Captain George, 65
- Hook, Marcus, revolt by, 146
- Hoorn-kill, seizure of, 142, 143
- Hopkinson, Thomas, 408
- Hosset (or Osset), left as commissary, 50
- House of defense, 264
- Hudde, Andreas, commissary at Fort Nassau, 93
- Hudson, Henry, exploration of, 34-35
- Huguenots, the, 301
- Huyghen, Hendricks, 73, 107
- Immigrants, arrival of at New Amstel, 133
- Immigration, beginning of the tide of, 301, 302 increase of, 368
- Impost on liquor, 337, 354
- Impeachment trial, an early, 310, 311
- Inbert, Andrew, 392
- Indentured servants enlisted, 389; enlistment of, 444
- Indian agents recommended, 426 aid to the English, 427 anthropology, 12 chiefs, 4 claims, 166 complaints, 395 council at Logstown, 418 council at Printz Hall, 102 deed, an old, 377
fealty to the English, 417, 428 humor, 396 intercourse, 425, 426 outbreak at Manhattan, 106 purchase, 1682, 242, 243 purchase, bounds of, 242, 243 relations under Keith, 366, 467 removals, 395, 396 sales of land by, 287-289, 426 trade, 88
trade, attractiveness of, 216 trade, conditions of, 420 trade, restrictions on, 339 treaty at Chester, 87 treaty with Maryland, 396 treaty with Virginia, 396
- Indians, abuse of liquor sale to, 123 ask for more pay for lands, 395 at Aughwick, 428
Captain Smith's description of, 31-33

INDEX

Indians, characteristics of, in Pennsylvania, 26

Conference of, with Peter Minuit, 70 conscious of ruin from drink, 124 council of, at Fort Nassau, 98 description of, by De Vries, 56 fire-arms supplied to, 21

first supplied with rum, 15-16

Five Nations of, 6

French efforts to influence the, 416

French operations against the, 418 frequent selection of, for guides, 130, 131 friendliness of, towards De Vries, 54-55 friendliness to pioneers, 33, 40 implements of, 9-11

injury to, by drink, 295

Iroquois supremacy in Pennsylvania, 23-24

Iroquois supremacy over the Minsi, 23-24

Len-â-pé, or Leni Len-â-pé, 3

Lenâpé migration, 27, 29

liquor selling to, 123, 124, 127

money (Zewandt), 92

moral condition of, 15 murder of, at New Amstel, 127 negotiations with, 171, 172

New Sweden threatened by, 86, 87 number of in Pennsylvania, 7 objections of, to the walking purchase, 378 occupations and dwellings of, 7-8, 10 of Pennsylvania, the, 1-29 of Pennsylvania, characteristics of, 3 of Pennsylvania, number of, 2 of Pennsylvania, their origin, 2 of the interior, 16-17

on the Delaware, estimate of number, 64 payment to, at Philadelphia, 395

peace made with, 129

peace with, in the colonies, 339 penalty for selling liquor to, 161 political system of, 6-7 possession of land among, 9

presents to by the Dutch, 112 privileges of laws extended to, 339 purchase from, claimed by the Dutch, 59

Indians, purchase of land from, 79, 98 relations of Lenâpé to Iroquois, 19-21 release of lands by, 366

religion of, 13-14

removal of, westward, 372

restrictions upon, 366, 367

revenge of, for murder, 128 sale of arms to, forbidden, 22

sale of land by, 376, 377

sale of lands by, to the Dutch, 117 sale of liquor to, restricted, 268, 269

second treaty of, with Swedes, 72 struggle between Lenâpé and Iroquois, 22-23

sub-tribes of, 5, 6

Swedes' agreement with, 70, 71

the Massawomecks, 31

the Susquehannock, 17-18

threatened war with, 152, 155 threats of, against settlers on the Susquehanna, 432

totems of, 5

trade with, on the Hudson river, 21 treaties with, 242

treaty with, under Keith, 167 trouble between the northern and southern, 366

Industries, early, 171

Ingoldsby, Richard, 294

Ingram, Isaac, 253

Interest, rate of reduced, 368

Irish Quakers, the, 307

Iroquois confederacy, meeting with the, 399

Indians in Pennsylvania, 16-17 war among, 130

Jacobson, Hendrick, 300

Jacques Island, seat of authority, 82; identified as Little Tinicum, 55

Jacquet, John Paul, 112

James, Duke of York, grant to, 136, 139

James II, 199

decision of, as to boundary, 180

Janney, Thomas, 121

Jasper, John, 188

Margaret, 188

Jegou, Peter, his island, 151

Jennings, Edward, 385

Samuel, 320, 332

Jews, settlement of in Pennsylvania, 354

INDEX

- Jones, Dr. Edward, 258, note; letter from, 258, 259, 323
 Griffith, 265, 315, 352
 Owen, 258, foot note
- John and Sarah, sailing of the, 218
- Jordan, Robert, 391
- Journal of Dankers and Sluyter, 180-187
- Judge, impeachment trial of, 310, 311
- Judges, protest against Quaker, 347
- Judicial system, the early, 270
- Jumonville, death of, 424
- Jury, the first trial, 296
- Justice, administration of, 363
- Kalmar, Nyckel the, homeward voyage of, 74; return of to Christina, 76
- Kearsley, Dr. John, 322
- Keeper of the great seal, 310
- Keith and Logan, strife between, 369, 379
- Keith, George, 199, 316, 319; 362; characteristics of, 319; charges against, 319; trial of, 320; relations of with Indians, 366, 367
- Keith, Sir William, 355, 361; allegiance of to the Assembly, 368; close of administration of, 371; old age and death of, 371
- Kent deputies from, 265
 the ship, 196
- Kidd, Captain, 334
- Kieft, Willem, 71, 72, 74, 75, 76; unwise administration of, 92
- King George II, money voted for, 390
 of England, 315
 William III, petition to, 294
- "Kingsesse," 91
- Kinsey, John, 399
- "Kleynties and his comrades," significance of, 45-46, 48
- Kling, Mans, 72, 73, 80
- Kreigsheim, immigrants from, 306
- Krygier, Capt. Martin, 120
- Lambert, General, 313
- Lamberton, Capt. George, 79
- Lancaster, county, erection of, 372
- Land, further grants of, requested, 172, 173
 grant of, to the Ohio company, 416 grant of, to Society of Traders, 219 grants, changes of, with Swedes, 258 grants of, 148
 grievance of colonists concerning, 318
- Land, Indian sale of, to proprietaries, 376 377 offered for Connecticut immigrants, 423 patents, delay in granting, 318 per cent. of, allowed for roads, 338, 339 probable definite grants to Swedes, 133 purchase by Penn., 287
- Landing, Robert Wade's, 241
- Lands, claims against, by Indians, 366 grant of, to Gov. Dongan, 293 offer of, to soldiers, 442 offered by Virginia for troops, 423 on the Susquehanna, 292, 294 purchase of, from Indians, 412 unoccupied, 402
- Langhorne, Jeremiah, 372
 Thomas, 322
- Lardner, John, 374
- Large, Ebenezer, 391
- La Salle's discoveries, 177, 187 discoveries on the Ohio, 178, 179 visit to Western Pennsylvania, 178
- Lawrence, Thomas, 399, 408
- Lawrie, Gawn, 194
- Laws, 266-270 governing removals, 278, 279
 new set of, urged, 337 objection to many, in London, 345 submission of, to the King, 345 ten important, 368
- Larrin, Andrew, 302
- Legislators, some of the early, 320-324
- Legislature, permanent separation in the, 348
- Lehmann, Philip W., 288
- Lenâpé, number of in Pennsylvania, 2
- Letitia house, 261 foot note
- Letters from a Farmer, 560-562; quotations from, 362
- Liberty of conscience, 266, 267
- Licenses, early, 269, 270
- Lieutenant-governor, two appointments of, 316
- Lieutenant-governors, unfortunate character of, 348
- Lieutenant-governorship, not desired, 312, 313
- Lindstrom, Peter, 100; town laid out by, 102

INDEX

- Lion, arrival of the, 271
- Liquor, impost on, 337
selling to Indians, evils of, 428
- Little Meadows, fort built at, 436
- Lloyd and Blackwell, trouble between, 313, 314
Charles, 324
David, 313, 316, 324, 335; 344, 352, 370; death of, 372; selection of as speaker, 371; speaker, 351
Thomas, 296, 300, 313, 316, 324, 346, 391; and his family, 306; commission of, as lieutenant-governor, 316; election of as president, 315; prominence of, 310
- Lock, Carolus, fine of, 147
Rev. Lars Carlsson, 93
- Logan, James, 265; appointment of, as secretary, 337; 343; charges of against Lloyd, 360; arrest of, 360, 361; letter from, 361, 362; 363, 367; and Keith, strife between, 369, 370; removal of, from office, 369; restoration of, as secretary, 370; as chief justice, 372; gift of, for library, 386; letter of, to the meeting, 390, 391; resignation of, 407
- Logan square, 258
- Loganian Library, 386, 387
- London, plague in, 192
- Long Finn, the, trial of, 147
- Lord Baltimore, his claims, 282; orders of, to survey lands, 118, 119; vs. the Penns. decision of, 412, 413; claims of, 379-382
- Lords Commissioners for Trade, Penn before the, 200
- Loss of Swedish expedition, 94, 97
- Louis the Fourteenth, 301
- Lovelace, Governor, 145-147; terms of, 148; letter from, 159
- Lower Counties, the, 220 control of the, 348 discontent in, 315, 316 settlement stopped in the, 386
- Lower Marion, description of, 259
- Lowther, George, appointment of as captain, 347
Margaret, 363
- Magistrates, respect for, demanded, 310
- Mahanoy, burning of village at, 451
- Manhattan, bad conditions at, 92
Dutch trade at, 40
- Manhattan, purchase of, 50
rapid growth of, 94
- Mann, Abraham, 265
- Maps, early Dutch, 44-47
- Market-house, the, 258
- Markham, Sir John, 321
William, 273; accused of piratical connivance, 314; as lieutenant-governor of lower counties, 316; as Penn's agent in England, 310; letters of, 239-241; lieutenant-governor, 236; visit of, to Maryland, 218; 310, 320, 321; appointment of, 326; arrival of in America, 230; commissioned by Penn, 328; administration of, duration of, 334; purchase of, 289, 290
- Marquis of Halifax, letter to the, 302
- Marriages, provisions governing, 269
- Maryland and Delaware, relations of, 379 authorities, extravagant claims of 318 boundary line, 238 colony, the, 117 council, 121, 122 demonstrations, fruitlessness of, 120 government, demonstrations by, 156, 159 proprietor, jurisdiction of, 386 weakness of patent of, 121, 122 settlements, desertions to, 118
- Mary of Southampton, seizure of the, 296, 299
- Massachusetts, offer of aid from, 424
- Master of the rolls, the, 300; appointment of, 310
- Matson, Margaret, 300
Neels, 300
- Mattahoon, Indian chief, 70
- Mattiniconck, importance of, 151
- Mayor of Philadelphia, the first, 316
- Meeting house, the, 258 of justices at Albany, 291
- Meinardean, Peter, 302
- Mennonites, the, 305
- Mey, Cornelius, agent of the West India Company, 49; as the first pioneer to State river front, 40; visit of, to America in 1623, 49; visit of, to Delaware Bay, 40
- Miffin, John, 399
- Military appropriation, 433 expeditions against French subjects, 431

INDEX

- Military funds, method of raising, 434
 march of from Will's Creek, 416 movements, 401 preparations under Thomas, 187 roads, 434, 435
- Militia, conflict of, with watchmen, 351, 352 need of, 335 organization of a, 351 summoned to Will's Creek, 423
- Mills, early, 175
- Minuit, Peter, 69, 70; departure of, 72;
 director-general, arrival of at Manhattan, 50; loss of, at sea, 73; recall of, 59
- Moll, John, 220, 254, 265, 266, 273
- Money advanced for troops, 390 rate of interest on, reduced, 368 voted for the King's use, 390, 427 voted for the Queen, 360, 361
- Montour, Andrew, 417
- Moore, Dr. Nicholas, speaker, 274
 John, 307, 336; advocate, 335; attorney-general, 347
 Nicholas, 300, 310; arrival of, 271
- Morals, provision for good, 267, 268
- More, Nicholas, 219, 288
- Morrey, Humphrey, 316
- Morris, Anthony, 352; removal of, from judgeship, 335; writ of replevin by, 335
 Col. Lewis, 238, 431
 Robert Hunter, arrival of, 431
- Murder of Indians near New Amstel, 127
- Naming of Delaware Bay, 40
- Naturalization act, 265
- Navigation act, the, 136
- Nertunius, Rev. Matthias, 100
- New Albion, description of, 61, 62
 grant of, by Charles I., 59
- New Amstel (New Castle), 111 capture of, by the English, 141 peace at, 122
 soldiers sent to, 120
- New Amsterdam, surrender of, to England, 140
- New Castle, 184; arrival of the Welcome at, 254
 county, 173, 174 delivery of, to Penn., 254
 deputies from, 265
 fort built at, 98
 fort, commander at, 146 settlement at, 79
- New Castle, the 12-mile circle around, 220, 281
- New England, immigrants from, 307
- New Gottenburg, fort of, 82
- New Jersey purchase, the, 79
- Newlin, Nicholas, 307
- New Netherland as English territory, 139 authority over, 143 restoration of, to England, 160 seizure of, by England, 107
- New period of development, 66
- New River, the, 46
- New Sweden, 67; agricultural operations at, 86
 arrival of goods in, 88 arrival of new governor of, 102 cattle in, 91 condition of, 1650, 97, 99 conditions described by De Vries, 83-85 defensive buildings in, 88, 91 desertions from, 102 despair in, 98, 99
 divine worship at, 81
 Dutch expedition against, 103, 104 health of settlers in, 88 importance of, 74
 instructions for operations at, 81 its length of life, 74 kinds of trading goods in, 91 lack of trading goods at, 87, 88 misfortune of, 74
 new commissary for, 100 new director in, 102
 new regulations for, 102 ninth expedition to, 100 operations at, 81, 82 shipbuilding in, 99 shipments from, 86 trying times in, 86, 87
- New York, capture of, by Holland, 160 effects of Penn's purchase at Albany
 in, 291
 seeks re-annexation of Pennsylvania, 294
- Nicolls, Col. Richard, 140, 142-144; governorship of, 144; honorable administration of, 144; inspection by, 143; return of to England, 144
- Noble, Richard, surveyor, 171
- Norris, Isaac, 307, 324, 372, 390, 392, 419,

INDEX

- 425; departure of for England, 358;
Quaker leader, 391
Norris party, the, 392
Richard, 363
Northampton county, formation of, 412
North, Lord Chief Justice, 295; submission of patent to, 202
Oath of office required, 348
Ohio company, the, 416 Onrust, the, 40, 41, 43-48; at the mouth of the Schuylkill, 43 building of, 40
explorations with the, 41 petition of owners for trade privileges, 43-48
Original counties, 263
Orndt, Major Jacob, 491
Owen, Griffith, 323, 343
Oxenstiern, Chancellor Axel, 68
Palatinate, emigrants from the, 305 persecution in the, 305
Palmer, Anthony, 408
Papegoia, Madam, 147 Paper money, issues of, 371 proposition to issue, 443
the first issued, 368, 369
"Paradise Point," 70
Parallel, the 40th, as the boundary, 381, 382; uncertainty of location of, 382 the 39th as a boundary, 381, 382
Paris, Ferdinand John, 372
Partridge, Richard, 390
Passyunk, fortified post at, 79
Pastorius, Francis Daniel, 305 purchase of land by, 306 Peace established with the Six Nations, 425 ordered on the borders, 385
Pemberton, Israel, jr., warrant for, 388
Phineas, 322, 343; 274 note
Penn, Captain and Admiral William, 188, 189, 192, 193, 210
Dennis, 363; death of, 372 373 family, the, 188; adjustment of the differences of the, 372, 373
Gaskell family, 373
Hannah, 363, 369, 370; deeds from,
373; letter to, 361, 362
John, 363, 383, 406, 424; arrival of, 419; birthplace of, 374; death of, 401; deed to, 373; head of the government, 374; son of Richard, 405; the American, 374; 401; visit of, to America, 375;
will of, 405
Penn, Richard, 361, 402; death of, 406; deed to, 373; family of, 405; son of Richard, 405
Springett, 370; death of, 373
Thomas, 361, 374, 376, 402; anecdotes of, 406, 407; arrival of, 375; bequest to, 405; death of, 406; deed to, 373; estates in charge of, 406; estimate by, 403-405; leniency of, 390; marriage of, 406; precedence of, 375; sacrifice by, 387; treaty with, 378
Penn, William, the Founder, 188, 189, 291, 301, 322, 324, 366, 367, 416
a Knight's son, 325 acquisition of Susquehanna lands by, 294 accusations against, 326 and Lord Baltimore, differences between, 282
and the colonists, differences between, 338
application of, for grant, 199 arrest of, 359
as president of the Council, 296 assignment to, 194
description of his town by, 295 occupies the slate roof house, 337 opposition to, at Albany, 293 Blancroft's praise of, 216 basis of his colony, 279, 280 banishment of, from Oxford, 191 becomes a Quaker, 192, 193 commissioners cf, 217 compromise of, with the Fords, 359 conditions imposed upon, 228 confirmation of will cf, 373 character of expectations of, 216 children of, 331 dealings of, with the Iroquois, 299
death of, 363
deed of Pennsylvania from, 334 deprived of his government, 326 disowned by the Meeting, 358 dispossession of, threatened, 294 draft of patent by, 201 early letter of, 192, 193, 203 early religious thoughts of, 189

INDEX

- Penn, William, the Founder, early Quaker leanings of, 189, 190 early thoughts of America, 193 efforts to raise money for, 358, 359 emotions of at Philadelphia, 257 estates, conditions regarding the, 374, 375 estates, different kinds of, 402 estates, estimate of, 403-405 estates, struggle as to taxing, 418 eulogy on the second wife of, 332 extracts from letters of, 261, 271, 272 government restored to, 328 his student life, 189 important papers by, 212, 215 instructions of, 217, 218, 314 interest of, in New Jersey, 194 landing of, at New Castle, 254 landing of, at Upland, 255 land purchases by, 287-289 large powers granted to, 203, 204 lease of land by, from Dongan, 293 letters of, 216, 217, 253, 254, 283, 284, 290, 295, 302 letters of, to settlers, 204, 207 manors of, 403 marriage of, 193 meeting of, with Lord Baltimore, 270, 271, 281 military life of, 192 motives of, 204
 pamphlet by, 210, 211, 260 patent of, approved, 203 patent of, renewed, 202 place and date of birth of, 185 prices paid for land by, 289 prohibitive features of, 310 prompt action of, 210 reasons of his success, 209 relations with the Indians, 284-288 release of from prison, 359 request for loan by, 327 request of, for restoration, 327 rights of, on the west bank of the Delaware, 220
 sales of land by, 306
 sale by, to the crown, 362 sailing of, for America, 223 sails for England, 252 second marriage of, 331
 speech of, 254
- Penn, William, the Founder, spread of his movement in Germany, 306 suggestion of, to Lord of Trades, 334 suspected of being a Papist, 325 terms of sale by, 211 travels of, in Europe, 191, 192 trustees of property of, 363 verdict against, 359 visit of, to Holland, 199 visit of, to Ireland, 192 visit of, to Philadelphia, 257 visits New York, 262
 bill of, 363
 youth of, 189
- Penn, William, jr., 352, 363, 370; arrival of, 357; character of, 364; children of, 365; death of, 365, 370; denouncement of, 353; instructions from, 364, 365; payment of debts by, 359
- Penn, William, son of Springett, 373
 William, the younger, 331, 332
- Penn's (William) agents in Rotterdam, 306 boundary agreement by the, 382 deeds recorded in New York, 262 fairness towards the Indians, 290 government, organization of, 262-270 heavy outlays, 325 lieutenant-governors, 346-362 petition of the, 381
 private property of the, 403 title to soil of lower counties, 381 widow, death of, 373
- Pennsylvania and Virginia boundary, 423 an English community, 307 and Maryland boundaries, 244-252, 270, 271, 281, 282 charter, the, 223-235 committed to Benjamin Fletcher, 326 community, 173
 Dutch, the, 308
 early description of, 239-241 effects of French war in, 416 frame of government of, 212, 215 first white men in, 30 in harmony with Indians, 420 History, beginning of, 1 mortgage on, 159 religious movements in, 375 settlement, effect of, at Albany, 291 the granary of America, 408 traders complained of, 416
- Pennypacker, Governor, 323

INDEX

- Pepperell, Sir William, 431
- Peace, of Breda, 144
- Peter Hendrick, in Philadelphia, 432
- Peters, Rev. Richard, 419, 425, 435
- Philadelphia as laid out by Penn, 295
- beginnings of, 258
- changes of land grants in, 258
- claim of Dutch purchase on site of, 59
- creation of false alarm in, 356, 357
- deputies from, 265
- early conditions at, 260, 261
- early fair and market at, 295
- first charter of, 316
- first clerk of, 316
- first mayor of, 316
- first occupancy of, by white men, 82
- first recorder of, 316
- fear of attack upon, 408
- Hill chosen mayor of, 360
- Indian treaty at, 376-378
- land grant in, 378
- measures for defense of, 408, 411
- new charter for, 343, 344
- plan of, 257, 258
- port of supply, 408
- purchase of land within site of, 79
- purchase of site of, 90
- site of, chosen, 241, 242
- Phillips, Frederick, 294
- Pietersen, Evert, 114
- Pietists, the, 308
- Pioneer English settlers, 307
- hardships, 177
- white men in Pennsylvania, 30-66
- Pioneers, first contact of with Indians, 34
- Piracy, 334, 335
- enactment of a law against, 137
- Piratical craft in Delaware bay, 335
- Plain Truth, 408
- Plan of Broad and Market streets, 58
- Plockhoy, Cornelius, 142
- Plowden, Sir Edmund, arrival of, 61, 62;
- grant to, 59, 60; return of to England, 62
- Polc, John, 399
- Political conditions in England, 207, 208
- contest, Allen vs. Norris, 392
- Poll tax, 166, 167; how collected, 167; list of persons subject to, 167, 168
- Pontiac's conspiracy, 58
- Population statistics, 162
- Powlett, Earl, 373
- President-general, duties of, 425
- Preston, Samuel, 324, 363
- Printz, John, 62, 76
- arrival of, 76
- as governor of New Sweden, 85
- departure of, from New Sweden, 99
- grants of land to, 93
- his instructions for New Sweden, 81
- his prominence in New Sweden, 81
- succession of, to Hollender, 80
- Printz Mauritiz, wreck of the, 113
- Printzsdorp, 93
- Printzhof, naming of, 83
- Proclamation of war with France, 395
- Profanity, penalties for, 268
- Progress in 1682, 241, 242
- on the Delaware, 236
- Proprietaries, agreement between adverse, 386
- agreement of, with the Susquehanna company, 57
- aid in building fort, 419
- purchase of lands by the, 426
- proposition of exemption, 442, 443
- Proprietary authority, complaints against, 352
- failure of first, to return, 346
- governments, annexation of, to the Crown, 340
- grants, 203
- title of, to the lower counties, 380
- Proprietors, agreement of, 194
- temporary jurisdiction of the, 386
- Property, distribution of, 269
- Protestant land for burying grounds, 372
- Province, agent of, in London, 372
- defense of the, 387
- Island, building on, 82
- Provinces called to New York treaty with Indians, 423
- Provincial council, early business of, 296
- election of a, 328
- function in law making, 320
- minutes of, 295, 296
- penalties inflicted by, 296, 299
- secretary to, 300
- Provincial court judge, impeachment of, 310, 311
- court, opening of the, 347
- Provisions, prices of, 239
- Public landing place, the, 257
- Square in Philadelphia, 258
- Pusey, Caleb, 323, 343

INDEX

- Quakers, 185, 186
 Quakerism, doctrine of, 191 reception of, in Wales, 307, 308
 Quaker control, restlessness under, 348 influence in the Assembly, 390 judges, protest against, 347 opposition to Indian war, 418 policy in war, 391
 preachers, persecution of, 191
 Quakers and German politics, 392 and the governor, disputes between, 391, 392
 defense of, by Penn, 347 driven from the State house, 392 peaceful intentions of, 315 sense of equality among, 310
 the Christian, 320
 Quarry, Robert, made judge of the Admiralty, 315
 Queen, vote of money for, 360, 361
 Queen's demand for men, 360
 Quit rents, act for collection of, 354 as part of the Penn estate, 402
 low paid, 371
 Rambo, Pieter, 114, 162
 Rambo, Peter Gunnaesson, sketch of, 75
 Randolph, Edw., 314
 Rappe, Capt. Gabriel, 302
 Raquier, Jacob, 302
 Rawle, Francis, 323
 Recorder of Philadelphia, the first, 316
 Religious movements, 375 persecution as a cause of immigration, 302, 305
 Religious sects unmolested, 354
 Remke, Govert, 306
 Remonstrance to the King, a, 390
 Report on Logan letter, 391
 Riboleau, Nich., 302
 Richardson, Francis, 307, 324
 John, 273
 Samuel, 323
 Riot of 1742, the, 392
 Risingh, Johan Claesson, 100; departure of for England, 106
 Rittenhouse square, 258
 Roads, laying out of, 414
 ordered opened, 279
 Roades, John, 273
 Robinson, Patrick, 311
 Rochford, Dennis, 275, 296
 Roman Catholics, attack upon, 355 Royal governor, authority of, in Pennsylvania, 294, 295
 Rudyard, Thomas, 217, foot note
 Ruyven, Cornelius Van, 120
 Sabbath day, restrictions on the, 268
 Sale of liquor to the Indians restricted, 268, 269 of West India Company claims, 112, 113
 Salem, naming of, 196
 Sample, William, 265
 Sandelands, James, 171, 236, 265
 Scarrooyady, advice from, 420
 in Philadelphia, 431
 Schepel, its meaning, 167, foot note School house, the, 258 teacher of the first, 296
 the first, 115
 the first indication of, 299
 Schuylkill, grants of land on, 173 settlement on the, 82
 the key to Indian trade, 94
 Schute, Sven, 100, 101, 114
 Scotch-Irish immigration, 307, 368
 Scotch settlers, the, 307
 Scott, John M., 323
 Seizure of Swedish vessels by Stuyvesant, 103
 Servants, sale of, 165
 Settlement, first permanent on Delaware river, 73
 near Laurel Hill, 418, 419
 on the west of the Susquehanna, 383 Settlers, conditions of early, 174 names of early, 323 summoned to welcome Penn, 254
 Shamokin lands, reservation of, 426
 Sheriffs, issue of writs to, 262
 Shickelamy, John, 426, 431
 Shippen, Edward, 307, 341; appointment of, as mayor, 341; chosen speaker, 331;
 president of the council, 347
 Shippenburg, building of fort at, 442
 Shirley, Governor, in command of troops, 431
 Shoemaker, Benjamin, 408
 Simcock, John, 312, 322; chosen speaker, 332
 Simon, Menno, 305
 Sipman, Direk, 306

INDEX

- Six Nations, alleged breach of faith by the, 432
 asked to make war, 399 fears for fealty of the, 396, 399 peace with, 425
 presents for, 375
 purchase from, 412
 sale of land by, 426
- Slaves of the Dutch colony, 142
- Sluyter, Peter, 180
- Small-pox on the Welcome, 253
- Smith, Captain John, 30-31, 32, 35; extract from journal of, 31-33; interview with Indians, 33
 Ensign Dirk, 112
 Henry, 218
 Provost William, 413
- Society of Friends, the, 309 schism in the, 316, 317; political opposition to, 336; political organization of the, 390
- Songhurst, John, 275, 322
- Southrin, Edward, 265, 273
- South River, D'Hinoyassa, ruler of, 113; direction of affairs of, 50; Dutch trade on, 56, 59; English visitors to, 59; Swedish expedition to, 69; cession of, 133; the Delaware, 49
- Springett, Guleilma Maria, 193
 Henry, 359
 Sir William, 332
- Stamper, John, 390
- Stanley, Thomas, 324
- Stanwix, Lieut.-Col. John, 470
- State house, the, 258; completion of, 373
- St. Clair, Sir John, 432, 434
- Stillé, Dr. Charles Janeway, 80
 Olaf, 114
 Olaf Persson, 80
- Stockdale, William, 322
- Story, Thomas, 343
- Strettell, Robert, 391, 408
- Streypers, Jan, 306
- Strobo, Robert, 427
- Stuyvesant, Governor Peter, arrival of, on the Delaware, 113 arrival of, at Manhattan, 93 embassy sent by, to Maryland, 120 ordered to retake Fort Casimir, 103 operations of, against New Sweden, 97, 98 visit of, to New Sweden, 98
- Stuyvesant's denouncement of Maryland's claims, 120
- Suits at law, 163
- Supply bill passed, 504
- Surveying in early years, 241, 242
- Suspension and restoration of Penn's government, 325-345
- Susquehanna company, proposed sale of lands by, 423 lands, 292-294; sale of to Penn, 294
- Susquehannock Indians, 17-18
- Swanandael, destruction of, 53-54; settlement at, 53
- Swanson, Swan, 237, 275
- Sweden, claims of, against Holland, 106 fourth expedition, from, 80 ships sent from, to America, 69
 third expedition from, 80
- Swedes, appeal of for more colonists, 94 and Dutch, absorption of, 307 and Dutch, conference between, 71 character of, at Christina, 80
 characteristics of, 261 conflict of, with the Dutch, 94 eighth expedition of, 94 expedition of, to the South River, 69 first settlement of, 67-108 loss of eighth expedition, 94, 97 mill of the, 91, 175 on the Delaware, misfortune to, 94 probable definite grants to, 133 refusal of, to enlist, 132 refusal of, to remove, 131, 132 settlement of, 65
 submission of, to the Dutch, 111 take oath of allegiance to Stuyvesant, 104
- Swedish colony, failure of the, 107, 108;
 friendly relations of, with Indians, 108;
 personality of, 75
 Company, agreement of, with Indians, 70, 71; enlarged charter for the, 68; organization of, 67; treaty of, with Indians, 72 governor on the Delaware, 62 expedition, arrival of, in the Delaware, 70; capital for, 69; the tenth, 107
- Swen, Oele, 162
- Sydney, Col. Henry, letter to, 295
- Symcock, John, 265, 273

INDEX

- Talbot, Richard, 221
 Taverns, early licenses for, 269, 270
 Taylor, Abraham, 408
 Christopher, 265, 273; sketch of, 322
 Col. Thomas, 270
 Tax, levied, 338
 Taxes, levy of, 313
 poll, 166, 167 Taxation, 400
 of the proprietaries, 442, 443
 Teacher, the first, in Philadelphia, 299
 Telmer, Jacob, 306
 Test, John, merchant, 171
 Third expedition from Sweden to Christina, 80
 Thirty years of war, the, 67
 Thomas, George, arrival of, 387; departure of, 407
 Till, William, 408
 Tinakonk, 183, 185
 Tinnicum (Tenacong), 82
 fort at, burned, 87 Island, 188
 mansion house built at, 83
 Swedish settlement at, 92, 83
 Tobacco, cultivation of, in New Sweden, 86
 Torkillus, Rev. Reorus, 76; death of, 86
 Town clerk, the first, 116
 Townsend, Richard, 271
 Trade legislation, 278 restriction on the Delaware, 156
 Trading post at Will's creek, 419
 Tradition of Lenâpé migration, 27-29 Treaty of peace, 411
 the great, 282-288
 the great, description by Penn, 285 the great, time of making, 283 tree, the, 286 foot note with Indians, 367
 with Indians at Philadelphia, 376-378
 Trent, William, 324; fort ordered by, 420
 Trial, the first, for witchcraft, 300, 301
 Trinity fort, reconstruction of, 102
 Troops, ammunition for, 400
 call for, 427 departure of, for Albany, 401 organization of, 389
 royal order for, 400
 Turner, Capt. Nathaniel, 79
 Joseph, 408
 Robert, 203, 296, 307, 310, 321;
 Penn's letter to, 216, 217
 Union, plan of, adopted, 425 of the colonies, effort for, 334 Upland (Chester), 87
 county, 237
 court, 236; complaint to, 175; jurisdiction of, 173, 174; justices, 162; meeting of, 172
 name changed to Chester, 255
 Usher, Thomas, 263
 Usselinck, William, 67
 Utie, Col. Nathaniel, letter to, 118, 119
 Van Bibber, Jacob Isaacs, 306
 Vanderbilt, Cornelius, 323
 Van Twiller, Wouter, arrival of at Manhattan, 59
 Verhoof, Cornelius, 265
 Vessel fired upon at New Castle, 358 Virginia, armed force from, 65 treaty of with Indians, 418
 Voyage of Cornelius Mey, 40
 Wade, Robert, 236, 275, 300; site of his house, 255; foot note; purchase of Printz-dorp by, 168, 171
 William, 253
 Waldenfield, Samuel, 363
 Waldron, Resolved, 120
 Walking purchase, the, 377, 378
 Waln, Nicholas, 275, 296
 War against the French on the Ohio, 431 among the Iroquois, 130 between England and Holland, 100; effects of, 159, 160
 between Swedes and Dutch, bloodless, 107 expected with France, 314 lawful and unlawful, 390 proclamation of, 347 prospects of, with Spain, 387
 Quaker opposition to, 347 with France, operations against Canada, 400, 401 with France proclaimed, 395 with Indians threatened, 152, 155 with Spain proclaimed, 388, 389 with Spain, troops for, 389
 Warner, William, 173, 236
 Warren, Peter, 399
 Wasa, building of, 88, 91; identical with Kingesse, 91
 Washington, George, at Fort Necessity, 426,

INDEX

- 427; complained of by an Indian, 428;
engages the French, 424; visit of, to French fort, 420; march of, from Will's creek, 424; reinforcement of, 426 square, 258
- Watson, Luke, 265
- Weights and measures, 278
- Weiser, Conrad, interpreter, 399
- Welcome, the, 220; arrival of the, 254;
births on board of, 251; sailing of the, 252; voyage of the, 252, 253
- Welsh colonists, arrival of, 302 company, the, 271 settlers, position of at home, 308 tract, the, 302
- Welton, Rev. Richard, D. D., 355
- Werden, Sir John, 200, 201, 202
- West, Benjamin, 283
Jersey colony, 195
- Western Pennsylvania, first white man in, 178; Indian occupancy, 18-19
- West India Company, charter of granted, 48; essentially for trade, 135; representative of, 116, 117; sale of its claims, 112, 113
- West Indies, immigrants from, 307
- Westminster, treaty of, 160
- Weston, Anthony, 299
- Whale fishery, intent to carry on, 50
- Whipping as a penalty, 299
- Wharton, Bromley, 323
- Wharton family, the, 323
- White pioneers, the, 30-66
- Whitwell, Francis, 265, 266, 322
- Whorekill county, deputies from, 265
- Wicaco, 259; church at, 177; patentee of land at, 163
- Wilcox, Joseph, 352
- William and Mary, patent from, 328
- William of Orange, 208
- Williams, Heinrich, 275
- Will, terms of Penn's, 363
- Wine making from native grapes, 302
- Wissahickon, 173
- Witchcraft, first and only trial for, 300, 301; verdict in case of, 301
- Withers, Ralph, 265, 273, 322
- Wolves, bounties for killing, 278
- Wood, John, 243
- Woodmancy, William, 173
- Woodmanson, William, 236
- Wynne, Dr. Thomas, 258 foot note; 265, 276, 323
- Wyoming lands, reservation of, 426
- Yardley, William, 265, 322
- Yong and Evelin, building of a fort by, 63;
significance of visit of, 62
Thomas, voyage of, up the Delaware, 62, 63; report of, 63
- Young (or Yong), Thomas, arrival of, 59
- York county, formation of, 412

XX 001 127 087

PLEASE RETURN TO ATWOODMAN LIBRARY

DE

DUE

